IDEA=i-dē'-ā, 6: s. Originally, a sight or vision of an object, when, by reason of distance, obscurity, excessive light, or other cause, we see only what sort of object it is, and cannot discern any individual characteristics; hence, among the ancient Platonists, the mental conception of a form or species, as distinguished from the mental representation of an individual object, which, considered apart from the eternal immutable form supposed to have been its model, exists only in its particular characteristics:—in modern philosophy the eternal immutable forms or species of the Platonists have no place, being regarded only as notions employed by the mind to assist its operations, and having no existence out of the mind; (see Metaphysics:)—hence, in modern writings, the word idea, when carefully used, implies precisely that which anciently stood opposed to it, namely, the mental representation of some individual object not present to the senses in which sense it is less comprehensive than image, for an image may be a fancied object, but an idea is strictly the mental representation of a real one; and it is also less comprehensive than conception; for a conception may revive audible or other sensible impressions, but an idea is in strictness confined to the representation of the visible only; these restrictions, however, are far from being regarded by all modern writers, and least of all by Locke, in whose essay, as well as in popular use, idea stands for a sensation, perception, conception, notion, image of a fancied or real object, thought, opinion, intention, in short for whatever we are at different times mentally conscious of:—the deficiencies of Locke's essay spring almost wholly from this lax use of a single word joined to that further laxity in manner of expression which tends to exhibit ideas, (thoughts,) not as what they really are, mere states of a conscious or intellectual being, but as creations, which have, when created, distinct existence.—See Thought.

IN-dūc'-tion, 89: s. Introduction, entrance; in old authors, a preface, an introduction to a play; in a special ecclesiastical sense, the investiture of the temporal part of a benefice, as Installation is of the spiritual: as a term in philosophy, see its senses lower.
IN-dūc'-tive, 105: a. Leading, followed by to; tending to induce or cause.—See also lower.
IN-dūc'-tive-ly, ad. In an inductive manner.
IN-DUC'-TION, s. (See some of its senses above.) The illation or inference of physics, as Deduction is of metaphysics; the act of drawing a conclusion, and also the conclusion itself, out of and in addition to single facts as a general fact or presumed truth in which they all meet, yet a truth which the facts do not necessarily contain or constitute, and which may therefore suggest itself with greater or less degrees of force, and be strengthened or weakened by subsequent experience: thus Newton, from certain observed single facts, inferred the law of gravitation; and thus an ignorant man, from facts, or imagined facts, infers that Friday is, in the nature of things, an unlucky day. Deduction, on the other hand, is the mental recognition of something particular as included or contained in something more general; or the recognition of something general as necessarily constituted by certain particulars: thus, having once admitted that all things tend to the centre, the tendency of any one particular thing to the centre is a deduction which necessarily follows the moment it is understood; and having once admitted in detail that each Friday during a certain period of time has been unlucky, the general statement that Friday has been an unlucky day during that time, is likewise a deduction which of necessity follows as soon as understood: these are metaphysical, not physical illations; the physical truths once admitted, stand on the footing of notions purely mental as to the consequences that follow, which consequences, therefore, like all metaphysical deductions, are the acts of the mind about its own notions. Of the two examples just given, the one is a deduction by descent to the particular truth, the other by ascent to the general, and it is usual to call this last an induction rather than a deduction: such an induction, namely, a metaphysical induction, or the illation of the general truth from the admitted particular truths that constitute it, is a very different thing from the illation of physics, and must be carefully distinguished from it in any but the popular use of the word. In popular use, induction is sometimes employed to signify the examination of particulars for the purpose of illation, whether of a physical truth or a metaphysical aggregate; sometimes the act of illation; and sometimes the truth or aggregate inferred. In scholastic logic, induction ought, consistently, to be restricted to metaphysical induction, but it is not always so restricted. In rhetoric, the confirming of a general proposition by the statement of single facts is often called an argument from enumeration; if each fact in the detailed statement requires only to be brought forward to be admitted, and if the general proposition is previously admitted as the aggregate of the single facts, the argument is strictly deductive, and the proof metaphysical or demonstrative: if the facts are admitted on the ground of probability alone, and the general proposition not as a metaphysical, but only as a moral universal, the argument is strictly inductive, and the proof can amount at its strongest only to what is called moral certainty: if the facts are admitted on experimental evidence, and the general proposition suggests itself as a truth in which they all meet, which can, however, no longer appear a truth than it depends on such evidence, then is the proof also strictly inductive, and the evidence in this case is called physical or experimental.

IN-DUC-TIVE, a. Relating to induction; established by induction; resting ultimately on experiment, although the truths admitted on experiment are carried into their remote consequences solely by deductive or abstract reasoning; hence, inductive philosophy includes all learning but such as rests ultimately on hypotheses or assumed definitions; learning which acknowledges no basis but the latter is distinctively called Science, as for example, pure mathematics: inductive philosophy can be called science in this distinctive use of the word only by considering it apart from its acknowledged basis, when all its subsequent conclusions are deductive.

IN-DUC-TIVE-ly, ad. By the method of induction.

IVY, Y-véy, s. A parasitic plant.

V-veyed, (-vid, 114) a. Overgrown with ivy.

J.

J is the tenth letter of the alphabet, but having been usually identified with I, the tenth letter in popular reckoning is K. Till of late years, English dictionaries have absurdly imitated those of the Latin language, in which the words commencing with I and J are mingled, because in the ancient mode of pronouncing Latin there was no other difference between the sounds of these letters than that we hear between i in re-tal'-i-ate, when pronounced in four distinct syllables, and the same letter in re-tal'-iate, pronounced in three by the added action which converts the vowel into a consonant sound. (See Prin. 58.) With us, and even in our pronunciation of Latin, J has not the smallest affinity with I; in the single word Hallelujah it retains its ancient sound; in all other words, it is a monograph or single mark for two consonant sounds considered as one, and forming the 64th element of the schemes prefixed. The ancient alliance between u and v was of the same nature as between i and j; and a correspondent difference exists in their modern sounds: moreover, as the ancient j is replaced by consonant y, so the ancient v is replaced by consonant w: (See V.) In contractions, I is still frequently used for J: thus I. H. S. often appear for J. H. S. (Jesus Hominum Salvator, Jesus the Saviour of men.)

To JABBER=jăb'-ber, 36: v. n. and a. To talk rapidly or indistinctly; to prate or chatter idly:—act. To utter with confused sounds.

La'-zi-ly, ad. Idly, sluggishly, heavily.

La'-zi-ness, s. Idleness, sluggishness.

LAZULI, lăz'-û-ll, s. Azure-stone: Laz'-u-lite is a mineral like it, but not so intense in colour.

LEA=lē, 103: s. (See Lay under To Lay.) A pasture, a meadow; a plain.

To LEACH.—See To Letch along with Letch (s.); or To Leech under Leech (s.).

LEAD, lēd, 120: s. A soft heavy metal of a dull white colour with a cast of blue; a plummet for sounding at sea; in the plural, a flat roof covered with lead.

To Lead, v. a. To fit with lead in any manner.

Lead'-y, a. Of the colour of lead. [Sir T. Elyot.]

Lead'-en, 114: a. Made of lead; heavy, motionless; unwilling; dull, stupid.

Among the compounds are Lead'-en-hearted; Lead'-en-heeled; Lead'-en-stepping; and Lead'-en-wort, the name of a plant.

To LEAD=lēad, } v. a. and n. To guide by the
I LEAD=lēd, 135: } hand; hence, to conduct, to LEAD=lēd, 135: } go before in showing the way, to conduct as a chief; to induce; to entice; to proceed in, as to lead a pleasant life.—adv. To go before; to take precedence or pre-eminence in any affair: To lead off, to begin.

Lead, s. Guidance; precedence.

Lead'-er, 36: s. One that leads; a guide; a chief.

Lead'-ing, a. and s. Principal, chief:—s. Guidance, conduct.

Lead'-man, s. He who leads a dance. [B. Jon.]

Lead'-ing-strings, 143: s. pl. Strings by which children are supported before they can walk without help.

Among the compounds are Lead'-horse, (a sumpter horse); Lead'-captain, (a favourite that follows as if led by a string); &c.

LEADY, &c.—See under Lead, (the metal.)

LEAF=leaf, 103: sing. } s. The green, and LEAVES, lēavz, 189, 143: pl. } generally deciduous parts of plants and flowers; that which resembles a leaf in thinness and extension, as a part of a book whose two sides are pages; and from analogy to this last, one side of a double door; the movable side of a table; any thing foliated, or thinly beated.

To Leaf, v. n. To shoot out or produce leaves.

Leaf'-y, 105: a. Full of leaves: this is better than Leaf'-y, which may also be met with. So Leaf'-iness, the ness is better than Leaf'-i-ness.

Leaf'-age, s. Leaves collectively: store of leaves.

Leafed, (leaf, 114, 143) a. Having leaves: in composition, Leafed (lēavd) is most in use; as in Two-leaved, Thick-leaved, &c.

Leaf'-less, a. Having no leaves: this is better than Leaf'-less, which may also be met with.

Leaf'-let, s. A little leaf.

Leaf'-stalk, (-stăwk, 139) s. The petiole or stalk which supports the leaf.

LEAGUE, lēag=lēguz, 189: s. A confederacy; a combination for interest or friendship.

To League, v. n. To unite, to confederate.

Leagued, 114: a. Confederated.

Leaf'-guer, (-guer) s. One united in a confederacy; also, in a sense now disused, a camp; an investment.

LEAGUE, lēguz, s. Originally, the stone laid or fixed to mark the end of a league; now, the distance itself, namely, three miles. A French league is two miles and a half all but 132 yards; a Dutch or German league is equal to four miles.

LEAK=lēk, s. A hole which lets in water: Spenser uses it as an adjective for Leaky.

To Leak, v. n. To let out in drops, or to receive in, as a containing vessel, some fluid substance: It may be found as an active verb in some phrases, as To leak or to leak out air, that is, to let out air.

LEA

Leak'-age, s. A leaking; the quantity that leaks out; an allowance in commerce for loss out of vessels holding liquids.

Leak'-y, a. Defective in power to retain or exclude fluids; figuratively, unretentive of secrets.

LEAM=lēam, s. A string to hold a dog; hence, Leam'-er, a dog, a sort of bound. [Obs.]

To LEAN=lēan, v. n. and a. To incline, or deviate from an upright position; to tend towards; to rest against; to be in a bending posture; to waver, to totter:—act. To cause to lean. With a different etymology, it has the obsolete or provincial signification of to conceal.

LEAN=lēan, a. and s. Wanting flesh, meagre, not fat; not unctuous; thin; hungry; low, poor, in opposition to great or rich; jejune, not embellished; shallow, dull:—s. That part of flesh which consists of the muscle without the fat.

Lean'-ly, ad. Meagrely. [Sherwood.] Spenser uses Lean'-y, which Todd interprets alert, active, deriving it from a different word.

Lean'-ness, s. Want of flesh; meagreness; want or poverty of matter; want of spiritual comfort.

To LEAP=lēap, v. n. and a. (See the pret. and part. below.) To move upward or progressively by a spring without change of the feet,—to jump; to bound, to spring; to start:—act. To pass over or into by leaping; to compress, as the male of certain beasts.

Leap, s. Jump; act of leaping; space passed, or proposed to be passed, by leaping; assault by leaping; embrace by leaping; figuratively, a sudden transition.

Leap'-er, s. One that leaps; a dancer.

Leap'-ing-ly, ad. By leaps.

LEAP'-FROG, s. A play of leaping like frogs.

LEAP'-YEAR, s. Every fourth year, which has one day more than other years, and which does not make every date in each respective month from March to March fall on the day of the week following that on which it fell in the previous year, as is the case with common years, but leaps over a day to make it fall on the next day of the week, that is, two days after that of the previous year.

I LEAPED, LEAPED, (lēpt, 135, 120, 114, 143) The preterit tense and the past participle of To Leap: the old pret. Lope is quite obs.

To LEARN, lern, 131, 120: v. a. and n. To gain knowledge of, or skill in; our old writers, and the vulgar to this day, also use it in the sense of to teach, which sense in good society is obsolete:—adv. To gain or receive knowledge, followed by of.

Learned, 114: part. Obtained as knowledge or information: it is commonly though irregularly pronounced not lerned, but lernt.

Learn'-ed, 114: a. Versed in literature and science; skillful, followed by in; in old authors, wise.

Learn'-ed-ly, ad. With erudition.

Learn'-ed-ness, s. State of being learned.

Learn'-er, s. One who is yet in his rudiments.

Learn'-ing, s. Knowledge, erudition; skill in languages or the sciences, but particularly such as form the ordinary course of a scholastic education; less frequently, skill in something not pertaining particularly to the schools.

To LEASE=lēas, 189: v. a. Literally, to let or allow to have for a time; properly, to let by a written contract.

Lease, s. A letting of lands, tenements, or hereditaments for a fixed term, sometimes at will, for a rent or compensation; the instrument by which the contract is made valid; poetically, any tenure.

Leas'-a-ble, 101: a. That may be leased.

Lease'-hold, (-hōld, 116) s. and a. A tenure by lease:—adj. Held by lease.

Lease'-hold-er, s. A tenant under a lease.

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

LEAF'-ER, s. A gleaner:—See also under Leasing.

LEASH=lēash, s. A leather thong by which a falconer holds his hawk, or a huntsman his dog; a band for tying anything; the things collectively which are held or joined by a leash real or imaginary, but properly meaning three things, as three greyhounds, three foxes, three hares, &c.

TO LEASH, v. a. To hold by a string; to bind.

LEASING=lē-zing, s. Lies, falsehood. [Obs.]

LEA'-SER, s. A liar. [Obs.] See also under To Lease.

LEASOW=lēa'-sow, s. A pasture. [Obs.]

LEAST=lēast, a. and ad. A word used as the superlative of little; little beyond others; smallest:—adv. In the smallest or lowest degree: At least, at the least, to say no more, not to speak or affirm more strongly: At leastwise, which was identical in meaning, is obsolete.

LEASY, lē-zēy, a. Flimsy, thin. [Obs.]

LEAT=lēat, s. A water trench to a mill. [Obs.]

LEATHER, lēth'-er, 120: s. The skin of an animal prepared for use; skin, ludicrously; it is sometimes used adjectively for leathery: As a verb, in low language, it signifies to beat as with a thong of leather; and also to dash or hurry along as by sparing no leather, though Todd derives this last sense from a Saxon verb of a different meaning.

Leath'-er-y, 105: a. Resembling leather.

Leath'-ern, a. Made or consisting of leather.

Among the compounds are Leath'-er-coat, (a name given to a tough-skinned apple;) Leath'-er-dresser; Leath'-er-jacket, (a jacket of leather, and also a name given to a fish of the Pacific;) Leath'-er-mouthed, (applied by Iz. Walton to fish that have their teeth in their throat, as the chub;) Leath'-er-sox'-ler; Leath'-er-winged, (an epithet of a bat,) &c.

shē-ā, 146, 147: s. A primitive earth, absorbent, anti-acid, and mildly cathartic.

☞ Luller allies this word with magnes, the classical name of the loadstone, but without assigning a reason.

Mag-ne'-si-an, a. Pertaining to magnesia.

Mag-ne'-si-um, s. The metallic base of magnesia.

MAGNET=mǎg'-net, s. The loadstone. Spenser calls it the magnet-stone: Magnes, the Greek and Latin word, is thought to be from the city of Magnesia in Lydia, where the stone is said to have been first found.

Mag-net'-ic, 88: } a. Relating to the magnet;

Mag-net'-i-cal, } having powers like those of the magnet; attractive: Milton once uses Magnetic as a subst. for Magnet.

Mag-net'-i-cal-ly, ad. By means of magnetism;

by an attractive power.

Mag-net'-i-cal-ness, s. Quality of being magnetic;

Magnetiness is scarcely to be met with.

Mag-net'-ics, s. pl. The principles or science of magnetism.

To MAG-net-ize, v. a. and n. To communicate magnetic properties to, to render magnetic; to affect by magnetism:—nes. To become magnetic.

MAG-net-ism, 158: s. The science of the properties and laws of magnetic power and influence; in a looser sense, the power of attraction generally: Animal magnetism is a method of treating diseases on the principle of a supposed connection of magnetism with the vital powers of animals.

MAG-net-o-e'-lec-tric'-i-ty, s. That branch of natural philosophy which is established on the ascertained fact that magnetism and electricity have certain principles in common. [Faraday.]

MAGNIFIC, &c., MAGNIFICENT, &c.,

MAGNIFICO, To MAGNIFY, &c., MAG-

NILOQUENT, &c., MAGNITUDE.—See

under MAGNA-charta.

MAGNOLIA, mǎg-nō-lē-ā, 90: s. The laurel-leaved tulip tree.

MAGOT-PIE=mǎg'-ōt-py', } 6: s. A bird

MAGPIE=mǎg'-py', } with pieced feathers, namely black and white, and prone to hoarding, as is implied by magot, of which mag is a contraction;

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

Consonants: mǎsh-ūn, i. e. mission, 165: vǐzh-ūn, i. e. vision, 165: mǎn, 166: thēn, 166, though according to Todd mag implies chattering; and according to Johnson, it is the abbreviation of Margery, and applied as Poll is applied to a parrot: Magpie is the word in use; the other occurs in Shaks.

MAGYDARE, mäg'-gué-dár, 77: s. An herb.

MAHOGANY, mǎ-hōg'-d-nēy, s. A hard reddish wood from the tropical parts of America.

MAHOMET=mǎ-hōm'-ét, s. The author of the Mahometan religion. Our old authors and a great many modern speakers pronounce the word Mah'-o-met; but the pronunciation assigned is sanctioned by good use and is more consistent with that of the derivatives: the correct orthography is said to be Mohammed; but Mahomet has been so long established as the English spelling, that there seems an affectation in attempting to disturb it.

Ma-hom'-e-tan, s. and a. A follower of Mahomet, a Mussulman.—adj. Of or belonging to Mahomet or Mahometanism.

☞ The word is also spelled Mohammedas and Mahomedas.

To Ma-hom'-e-tan-ize, v. a. To render conformable to the religion or customs of the Mahometans; otherwise spelled Mohammedinize.

Ma-hom'-e-ta-nism, 158: s. The religion established by Mahomet; otherwise, though less commonly, spelled Mohammedanism. Our old authors use Mahometism, Mahomettry, and Mahometism, all of which are now disused.

Ma'-hounD, (mǎh'-hownd, 23, 32) s. A contemptuous name used by our forefathers for Mahomet; thence, from the presumed identity of the persons, applied to the devil; and thence to any mysterious character of seeming power and great wickedness.

MAID=mǎde, s. A sort of skate fish.

MAID=mǎde, 100: s. A virgin; an unmarried woman; a female; a woman servant.

Maid'-en, 114: s. and a. A maid:—adj. Consisting of maids or young females; fresh, new, unpolluted; applied to asizes it signifies unstained by blood, or having none to condemn to death.

☞ It is applied substantively as the name of a washing machine, and also as the name of an instrument formerly used to behead criminals in Scotland: these may be allied to the present class, or to the adjective Maiden with a different etymology, and the sense of strong, impregnable.

To Maid'-en, 114: v. n. To speak or act demurely like a maiden; to be continent as a maiden.

Maid'-en-ly, a. and ad. Gentle, modest, decent:—adv. In a maidenly manner.

Maid'-en-liness, s. Modesty.

Maid'-en-head, (-hēd, 120) } s. Virginity; virgin

Maid'-en-hood, (-hōd, 118) } purity; freedom from contamination; newness, freshness; (the figurative senses are obs. or vul.): Maidenhede is an orthography quite disused: Maid'-hood occurs in Shaks.

Maid-Ma'-ri-an, 41, 105: s. Originally, the queen of May, one of the characters in the old Morris dance; which dance degenerating into coarse buffoonery and Maid-Marian being personated by a buffoon, the once elegant queen of May was named a Maids, and the expression Maid-Marian remained only as the name of a dance.

Maid'-pale, a. Pale as a sick girl.

Maid'-ser-vant, s. A female servant.

☞ Other compounds are chiefly names of plants; as, Maid'-en-hair, Maid'-en-lip.

MAIL=mǎle, 1: s. Primarily net-work, but applied specially to the steel net-work, or to the plates of metal with which some kinds of armour were made; any armour.

To Mail, v. a. To arm defensively.

MAIL=mǎle, s. A bag, but particularly that in which letters are enclosed for public conveyance: it sometimes signifies the conveyer of the bag, whether a person or a carriage: with a different etymology it signifies a rent; and with one again different, a macule or spot; hence, mailed may mean speckled.

Mail-coach', s. The coach that conveys the mail.

MAIL'-ET, s. A portmanteau. [Shelton.]

To MAIM=mǎme, 1: v. a. To deprive of any necessary part; to cripple.

Maim, s. Privation of an essential part; lameness, not conate or original.

Mayhem, (mǎm) s. Maim in law language.

Maim'-ed-ness, s. State of being maimed.

MAIN=mǎnt, 1: a. and s. Originally, great, mighty; whence its usual sense, principal, chief, leading; important:—s. Violence, force, as might and main; more commonly, the gross, the sum, the whole; the great sea as distinguished from bays or rivers; the continent as distinguished from neighbouring isles; a great duct as distinguished from the smaller ones supplied by it.

Main'-ly, ad. Chiefly, greatly; to a great degree.

Main'-land, s. The continent.

☞ Other compounds are for the most part terms on shipboard; as Main'-mast, Main'-keel, Main'-sail, Main'-sheet, Main'-top, Main'-yard, &c.

MAIN=mǎnt, s. A hand as of dice, or of fighting cocks, in the latter sense the term implying such as are at hand or ready.

MAIN'-OUR, 120: s. The thing found in the hand of a thief and taken from him.

MAIN'-PER-NOR, s. He to whose hand a man is delivered out of prison on surety to produce him.

MAIN'-PRISE, (-prize, 151) s. The taking or receiving of a person into friendly custody who otherwise might be committed to prison.

To Main'-prise, v. a. To bail.

To MAINSWEAR, mǎnt'-swǎre, 100, 42: v. a. In law, to swear evil or falsely.

☞ This word is etymologically distinct from the foregoing and the following class.

To MAINTAIN=mǎnt-tānt', v. a. and n. Literally to keep in hand; (See the class previous to the last word) to hold, preserve, or keep in some state or condition; to defend; to vindicate,—to keep up; to support:—adv. To assert as a tenet or opinion.

Main-tānt'-a-ble, 101: a. That may be maintained; justifiable.

Main-tānt'-er, 36: s. Supporter, cherisher.

MAIN'-TEN-ANCE, 81: s. Support, defence; supply of the necessities of life, sustenance; in law, an officious intermeddling in a suit by assisting either party with money or otherwise.

MAIZE=mǎiz, 189: s. Indian wheat.

MAJESTY, mǎd'-jēs-tēy, 105: s. Dignity, grandeur; greatness of appearance; sovereignty; the style or title of kings and queens.

Ma-jes'-tic, 88: } a. Grand, august, having dignity;

Ma-jes'-ti-cal, } regal, imperial: Maj'estat'ic and Maj'estat'ical are quite out of use.

Ma-jes'-ti-cal-ly, ad. With majesty.

Ma-jes'-ti-cal-ness, s. Dignity of manner and appearance: Maj'esticness is not now used.

MAJOR, mǎ-jor, 38: a. and s. Greater in number, quantity, or extent; greater in dignity:—s. He that is greater, particularly in years; that which is greater: a Ma-jor-du'mo is the principal in a house next to the master:—See other special applications below.

Ma-jor-a'-tion, 89: s. Enlargement. [Brown.]

Ma-jor-i-ty, 84, 105: s. State of being greater; in Shaks. the state of being high in rank; full age, end of minority; ancestry:—See also below.

MA'-JOR, s. The officer above a captain, being the lowest field officer; sometimes it is found instead of major: as an epithet appended to other denominations of men in the army, it implies the superior of the department, as a Drum-major: a Major-general is next in rank below a lieutenant-general.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Vowels: gǎt'-wáy: chǎp'-mǎn: pǎ-pǎ': lǎw: göd: j'ö, i. e. jeu, 55: a, é, i, &c. mude, 171.

Ma-jor'-i-ty, 84: s. The rank or office of a major.

MA'-JOUR, s. The first proposition of a syllogism containing some generality; or according to Aristotelian logic, that one of the two premised propositions which contains the major term, the major term being the predicate of the third proposition or conclusion, the subject of which is called the minor term.

To MAKE=mäkē, } v. a. and n. To cause; to
I MADE=mädē, } cause to be originally, to create;

MADE=mädē, } to cause to be secondarily,— to form, order, or arrange; to cause through the agency of another person or thing, to produce through some power over the immediate agent,—to force or constrain: these are the senses under which are contained all the special applications of this verb; as, to compose; to perform, to do; to settle; to commit; to gain as a purpose; to secure as a profit; to amount to; to establish in a purposed condition in opposition to may—new. To have effect; to operate; to do; to proceed; in a distinctive sense now disused, to produce poetry, with the notion that the poet is a creator; other applications of this verb, whether active or neuter, are determined by accompanying words: as To make away, to destroy; to transfer,—in the former sense often followed by with; To make account, to reckon; and followed by of, to esteem; To make free with, to treat without ceremony; To make good, to maintain; to fulfil; to supply an equivalent; To make land, to reach land; To make light of, to consider of no consequence; To make love, to court; To make merry, to feast; To make much of, to cherish; To make of, to understand out of; to produce from; to account; in old authors, to cherish; To make over, to transfer, to place with trustees; To make out, to ascertain; to explain; to evince; To make sure of, to secure; to consider as certain; To make up, to get together; to compose; to repair; to reconcile; To make as if, to carry an appearance; To make for, to tend towards; to tend in favour of; To make up for, to compensate; To make up to, to approach; To make at, to attack; To make with, (an old phrase), to incur.

☞ If some of the foregoing and other applications of the verb are not at once resolvable into the general sense, we may always presume an ellipsis out of which the phrase has arisen.

Make, s. (See also hereafter.) Form, structure.

Ma'-ker, s. He who makes; the Creator; a poet; he who makes any thing.

Ma'-king, s. Act of forming; workmanship; structure; in old authors, a poem.

☞ Among the compounds are Make-bate, (a breeder of quarrels); Make-peace, (a reconciler); Make-weight, (that which assists to make an equipoise—that which contributes to something not sufficient of itself); &c.

MAKE=mäkē, s. A mate, or one matched with another, a companion. [Spenser. B. Jon.]

Make'-less, a. Matchless; without a mate. [Shaks.]

young, not female:—s. The he of any species:—in another sense, see Mail, (a bag.)

Male'-spir-it-ed, a. Having the spirit of a man.

MALE-, A prefix that signifies ill. The first syllable is always pronounced short, and if a vowel follows, the sound of the second syllable or of the s is sunk, and often omitted in the orthography; hence an inconsistency either of spelling or pronunciation in many of the following words, for which usage alone must plead. Other words in which mal has the same origin and meaning are not in this class, because the letters are not so separable as to have the character of a prefix.—See Malady, &c., Malice, &c.

MAL'-CON-FOR-MA'-TION, 89: s. Ill form.

MAL'-AD-MIN-IS-TRA'-TION, (mäl'-äd-mîn-is-trä'-shün, 97, 89) s. Ill government of affairs.

Mat'-e-mat'-ics, s. pl. Literally, learning in general; (see the last word in the class; in the restricted sense in which the word is always understood, it is the science which contemplates whatever is capable of being numbered or measured; and it is either pure or mixed: pure considers quantity in the abstract without relation to matter, and hence is metaphysical and demonstrative; mixed is interwoven with physical considerations, and so far as dependent on these, is experimental or inductive.

Mat'-e-mat'-ic'-ian, (-tish'-än, 90) s. A man versed in mathematics.

MA-THE'-sis, (mä'-thé'-sīs,) s. Learning, know-

MAZEOLOGY, mā-zōi'-ō-gēy, 87, 105 : s. Mamalogy or mastology.

ME=mē or mē, 176 : pron. The accusative case of I; as an expletive, it is often governed by for, as to, or some such words originally understood; and in ludicrous language, the phrase thus established is purposely carried to a licentious extreme.

ME-SSEMS', 143 : v. n. It seems to me.

ME-THINKS', (-thīngks', 158,) } v. n. It thinks Me-thought', (-thāwt', 126, 162,) } or seems to me,
i. e. I think.

⚡ This idiom in old writers is imitated beyond grammatical licence; as "Me rather had my heart feel your love than," &c., instead of "I rather had," &c.

MEACOCK=mē'-cōck, s. and a. An effeminate man, a coward:—adj. Tame. [Obs.]

MEAD=mēd, s. A kind of drink made of water and honey.

MEAD=mēd, 103, } s. Grass land an-

MEADOW, mēd'-ōw, 120, } usually mown for hay; land unploughed, green with grass, and variegated with flowers; the former word is used chiefly in poetry.

To Met'-a-mor'-phose, (-fô-clé, 99) v. a. To change the shape of, to transform.

Met'-a-mor'-pho-ser, s. A transformer.

MET'-A-PHOR, (mêt'-d-for, 163) s. The transfer of a word to another than its literal application, in such a manner that a comparison is implied, though not formally expressed; as a smiling laud, in which the epithet is transferred from its strict use, and a comparison is implied between the land and a person that smiles; thus also a tide of passion; he bridles his anger: Metaphor is often used as a generic term for all the tropes.

Met'-a-phor'-ic, 88: a. Containing a metaphor;

Met'-a-phor'-i-cal, not literal; figurative.

Met'-a-phor'-i-cal-ly, ad. Figuratively.

Met'-a-phor'-ist, s. A maker of metaphors.

MET'-A-PHRASE, (-frâze, 163, 151) s. The transfer of phrases or idioms into another language without alteration,—a close or literal translation or interpretation: it stands opposed to paraphrase.

Met'-a-phrast, s. One who translates word for word.

Met'-a-phrast'-ic, 88: a. Literal.

MET'-A-PHYS'-IC, 88: } 163, 151: a. Going beyond

MET'-A-PHYS'-I-CAL, } nature; pertaining to metaphysics; abstract, general, existing only in thought and not in reality; in another but not a usual sense, though strictly consonant to etymology, transcending the bounds of ordinary nature, supernatural; thus in Shakespeare, "metaphysical aid."

Met'-a-phys'-i-cal-ly, ad. In a metaphysical manner.

MET'-A-PHYS'-ICS, s. pl. The learning which transcends physics, or, according to some, those sublimer subjects which Aristotle in the order of study placed after physics. These definitions are merely verbal. Another definition is, the science of the nature and causes of all things; but physical causes, namely, such as we obtain inductively, or by experience in particulars, are not contemplated in this definition, and causes of any other kind, it is now conceded, can have no proof which does not proceed on an assumption of the very thing to be proved. Other definitions which consider being in the abstract, or the general affections of substances existing as the proper subjects of metaphysical science, lay down, among the subjects, beings of a spiritual nature, as if spiritual were equivalent to abstract, and did not mean something existing, though not perceptible to sense. The Scotch philosophers, who justly claim the merit of having dispersed the splendid and imposing clouds which concealed the nothingness of school metaphysics, have endeavoured to establish the science on a new foundation. Assuming the province of physics as extending only to a certain range of real beings, namely, the inorganic parts of matter, and such of the organised beings as do not seem to think or reason, they propose that man who does not come within this division shall, not as a whole but in part only, be the subject of a distinct inductive science,—that the material man shall belong to physics, and the intellectual man to meta-physics. The little effect hitherto produced by the study as thus proposed, and the growing neglect of it as a system, appear to indicate a fundamental error. If it should appear that the subjects thus proposed to be separated are, to any useful purposes of study, inseparable; if the living sentient rational man, distinct as he is from inorganic matter, and from irrational animals, is nevertheless properly included among the subjects of physical inquiry; if, moreover, the existence of a God be another branch of inductive philosophy, properly belonging also to physics, (a distribution now generally recognised;) it follows, either that metaphysics have no claim to be considered a science distinct from physics, or that the ground on which it rests must be ascertained by some clearer marks than the preceding definitions furnish. Now, among the subjects of our thoughts there is this clear distinction; either we think of things themselves in their real individual existence, including things imagined to have a real existence; or that which is present to the mind is not a real existence, and cannot even be imagined to have a real existence; as the notion of a circle of no dimensions, that is neither great, nor small, nor between the two; the notion of a man who has no individual characteristics, that is, who is neither black, nor white, nor old, nor young, &c.; the notion of good which keeps out of view all things that are good, although it is certain that distinct from individual things and deeds, there can be no good or goodness. Physics, then, propose for examination and inquiry the former subjects; metaphysics propose the latter. It is true that this distinction does not separate the sciences in the practical pursuit of knowledge; for the study of physics must be pursued by means of those notions which belong to metaphysics, and in all the sciences the deductive part of the procedure is metaphysical. (See Induction.) What then, after all, does the metaphysician propose properly and exclusively? Even that which John Locke proposed in his Essay on the Human Understanding; to examine the grounds of human knowledge; to trace the inductive process in the formation of those notions, on which rest all the deductions we obtain in science, and all the conclusions we act upon in life. Locke's Essay is defective in its detail, in parts of its doctrine, and very commonly in mode of explanation; but in purpose it is distinct, entire, complete.

Met'-a-phys'-ic'-ian, (-fê-zîsh'-ăn, 90) s. One versed in metaphysics.

MET'-A-PLASM, 158: s. The transfiguring of a word, by altering certain letters, or retrenching some of them.

ME-TAB'-TA-SIS, 87: s. A passing of the seat of a disease from one place over to another.

MET'-A-TAK'-SUS, s. That which is taken with the sole,—the middle of the sole between the toes and the ankle.

Met'-a-tar'-sal, a. Belonging to the metatarsus.

ME-TATH'-E-SIS, s. A transposition,—grammatical, as of the r in iron, (iorn,) or the w in whim, (hwim;) medical, as of some cause of disease when it is not expelled from the system.

☞ The other compounds of meta-, which will be found in their alphabetical places hereafter, are Metempsychosis, &c., Metempsychosis, Metic, Metonymy, &c., Metoposcopy, &c., to which might be added Meteor, &c., and Method, &c., if through long use of the compounded forms they had not taken even in Greek the footing of original words.

METAGE.—See under to Mete.

METAL=mêt'-ăl, 12: s. An undecomposed body, insoluble in water, fusible by heat, and capable in the state of an oxide of uniting with acids and forming with them metallic salts: gold, silver, copper, iron, lead, tin, quicksilver, were the metals commonly acknowledged; but chemical science in its improved state now reckons thirty-eight metals, though some of them have never yet been exhibited in a separate MONETARY, mŭn'-ĕ-tār-ĕy, 116: a. Pertaining to, or consisting in, money.

→ This word is of recent use in the language: etymologically it cannot claim immediate relationship to Money, because the latter has passed through the Saxon from the original Latin, while Monetary comes directly from the Latin, and hence, a speaker might choose to say Mo-nĕ-tar-y: but this pronunciation, if it ever has been used, will inevitably yield to that which connects the word in sound as in sense with the established word money.

Mon'-ny, (mŭn'-ĕy, 116) s. Stamped metal, generally gold, silver, or copper, or any thing else used as the measure of price; coin; (a single piece is not now called a money, but a piece of money, and consequently the word does not at present often occur in the plural, unless in the sense of payments or receipts of money;) bank notes, notes of hand, letters of credit, accepted bills on mercantile firms; (these are called money, but such application of the word must be understood as a licence of speech, and the things themselves distinguished; for though, when immediately convertible, a bank note, &c. may be equal to money, perhaps more desirable as more convenient, yet it is liable to a discount, and to the bankruptcy or rogues of the subscribers or accepters, and therefore is not the same thing;) uncoloured gold or silver; (this may be deemed money without any or much danger from the extended use of the word, because the difference between stamped and unstamped metal, allowing the weight and purity in the latter case to be ascertained, is never so great as to leave much room for difference in any calculation; as an axiom in political economy, it should indeed always be deemed that while gold and silver remain the measure of price, the metal itself can never have a price.)

Mon'-ied, (mŭn'-id, 114) a. Rich in money; able to command money: it is often used in distinction to wealth in real estate; the old orthography was mon'-eyed.

Mon'-ey-er, 36: s. A banker, or one who deals in money; a minter. [Obs.]

MORAL=mōr'-āl, 129, 12: s. and a. In an etymological and general sense, practice, custom, the ordinary course of action, which meaning is retained in some of its applications; (see the last two words of the class) distinctively, it means good practice founded on views of right and wrong, more commonly called morality; hence, it also means the doctrine of good practice, commonly expressed by the plural word Morals, which sense however is signified by the noun singular when the doctrine or practical application of a fable is meant:—adj. Good, as estimated by a tacit standard of right and wrong, such as men acquire by the light of reason in their dealings with each other, and thus distinguished from good, meaning pious, as estimated by a law of religion; virtuous; just; drawn from the principles of morality; founded on morals;

prescribing men's conduct; Shakspeare in one place uses it to signify moralizing, as "a moral fool." The moral law, is the law of the tables delivered by Moses, in distinction from the ceremonial law; with regard to that or any other law that prescribes our duty as by divine authority, it may be observed that obedience to it simply on the principle that it is a law of God is religious goodness; conformity to it simply from rational motives is moral goodness; a conformity to it on both accounts identifies moral and religious goodness: the moral sense is a supposed innate or natural sense of right and wrong, concerning the existence of which much disputation has been expended, which might perhaps have been spared by a previous acknowledgement on both sides that our powers of judgement, whatever be their origin, can come into operation only with occasions for them, and be strengthened only by opportunities for exercise; that to feel an injury done to himself is a capacity in which man only shares with other animals; that to know when an injury is done to others is an inevitable effect of the possession and the exercise of reason; and that a capacity for emotion is as much a part of our nature as a capacity to know. Moral philosophy is the science of the duties of life, otherwise called Ethics and Morals; it is an inductive science or one which derives its rules from experience, although, as in all the sciences, a great deal of the reasoning is deductive or abstract: Locke, indeed, had a notion that it might be entirely reduced to a system of definitions, axioms, postulates, and deductions, like pure Mathematics; it might, no doubt, but its objects would not be in the least advanced, because in the application of such a science to the actions and designs of men, the nature or quality of those their individual actions and designs would remain as much a subject of doubt and discussion as ever, and the science would be practically useless.—See Mathesis and Science.

To Moral, v. n. To moralize. [Shaks.]

Mor'-al-er, s. A moralizer. [Shaks.]

Mor'-al-ly, ad. In a moral manner, virtuously, justly; according to moral doctrine:—See also lower.

Mor'-al-i'-zer, s. One who moralizes.

Mo-ral'-i-ty, 84, 105: s. (See the leading word.)

The practice of goodness,—virtue; the doctrine of goodness,—ethics; the quality of an action as estimated by a standard of right and wrong tacitly acknowledged by the great majority of mankind past and present: in a special sense a kind of drama which succeeded the Miracle plays among our forefathers, of which the persons in the play were abstractions or allegorical representations of virtues, vices, mental powers, and faculties.

Mor'-als, 143: s. pl. Ethics or moral philosophy; morality; (for these senses, see the leading word:) the practice or customary actions of any one as arising from habit and early impressions; in which sense the word loses its distinctive meaning, and we as properly say bad morals as good morals: Manners is often used as an equivalent term, but it admits nevertheless of a distinction from Morals.—See Manner.

MOR'-al, a. (See the leading word.) That is supported by the customary course of things, as moral certainty, a moral argument, a moral conclusion: A moral universal, is a universal customarily so taken, as in saying, All men are able to speak; which is not strictly true, though true as far as a customary meaning extends: moral certainty is distinguished from physical certainty, which is a certainty ascertained by the senses or obtained by a real induction and the actual examination of particulars; and also distinguished from metaphysical or mathematical certainty, which is a certainty evolved out of what is already admitted by an act of the mind which perceives it to be included in that admission.

NOISOME, noy'-süm, 29, 107: a. Noxious, mischievous; unwholesome; offensive.
Nei'-some-ly, ad. So as to be noisome.
NOI'-some-ness, s. State or quality of being noisome.
NOISY.—See under Noise.
NOLITION, nó-lísh'-ün, 90: s. Unwillingness, as opposed to Volition.
NO'-LI-ME'-TAN''-GER-E, s. "I am unwilling that any should touch me," applied as a name to a cancerous swelling exasperated by applications, and to a thorny plant. [Lat.]
NO'-LENS-VO'-LENS, ad. "Unwilling or willing." i. e. whether willing or not. [Lat.]
NOLL=nól, 155: s. Noddle; which see.
NOMAD=nóm'-äd, a. and s. Subsisting by the tending of cattle and wandering for the sake of pasturage; having no fixed abode; hence, rude, savage;—s. A wandering tribe or party; one of such a tribe.
No-mad'-ic, 88: a. The same as Nomad, and, as an adjective, the preferable word.
NOME, (nóme) s. A district or division of country.
NOMANCY.—See under Nome, (a name).
NOMBRIL=nóm'-bríl, s. The centre of an escutcheon, literally the navel.
NOM'-BLES, (nóm'-blz, 116, 114, 143) s. pl. The entrails of a deer, as being taken from near the navel.
NOME=nóme, s. That which has one name or mode of expression, applied in algebra to one of the quantities of a binomial, a trinomial, &c., with its proper sign which joins it to the next quantity; literally, a name.
NO'-MAN-CY, s. Divination by the letters that form a person's name.
NO'-MEN-CLA'-TOR, 38: s. One whose office or knowledge consists in calling each person by his proper name; a person who gives names to things.

NO'-MI-AL, 90: s. A name, name, or single term in algebra.
NOM'-i-NAL, 92: a. and s. Pertaining to a name or names; existing in name only, titular;—s. A nominalist.
NOM'-i-nal-ly, ad. By name, or in name only.
Nom'-i-nal-ist, s. One of a sect who, in opposition to the realists, considered universals in logic to be names only, and not realities: this question—which, from the eleventh century till almost the beginning of the present, divided the world, at some periods with a violence of contest equal only to the animosities of religious zeal, with which indeed it was often mixed—may now be deemed at rest; realism, at present, finds no supporters; but nominalists, among themselves, are said to be divided into two classes,—they who hold that the previous invention (or use) of a general or abstract name (at first a proper name) alone gives existence to its correspondent notion,—and they who hold that before a name can be applied (or extended), there must exist the notion to which it corresponds: the latter are sometimes called Conceptualists: the opinions, perhaps, after all, are only apparently at variance, and may both be entertained by the same mind without any absurdity.
To Nom'-i-na-lize, v. a. To convert into a noun. [Unusual.]
To Nom'-i-nate, v. a. To name, [Shaks.]; to entitle by a name, [Spenser.]; to set down or appoint by name; to propose by naming.
Nom'-i-nate-ly, ad. By name; particularly. [Spelman.]
Nom'-i-ná'-tion, 89: s. Act of nominating; power of nominating; state of being nominated.
Nom'-i-ná'-tor, 38: s. One that nominates.
Nom'-i-nee, 177: s. One nominated.

NON

Nom'-i-na-tive, 105: a. and s. That names, and nothing more:—s. The form of a noun which simply designates the person, thing, or notion, in distinction to any form which not only designates it, but also indicates a certain grammatical construction in which the noun is to bear a part; the right case, not an oblique case.
NONMOTHEIC=nóm'-ó-thét''-ick, 88: a. Placing or establishing laws; legislative: Nom'-o-thet''-ic is the same.
NON-, A prefix which gives a negative sense to words, and forms compounds with them, which have more or less of unity as single words in proportion as they more or less frequently occur.
NON'-A-BIL''-ITY, 84, 105: s. Want of ability; specially, an exception taken against a plaintiff when he is unable legally to commence a suit.
NON'-AGE, s. Time of life before legal maturity, which in this country is the age of twenty-one.
NON'-aged, 114: a. Being under age.
See Nonagistmal and Nonagon, which have no relationship to this class, hereafter.
NON'-AP-PEAR''-ANCE, s. Default of appearance, as in court, to prosecute or defend.
NON'-AP-POINT''-MENT, s. Neglect of appointment.
See Nonos, hereafter.
NON'-CHAL'-ANCE, (nóng'-shál'-óngac', [Fr.] 170) s. Want of earnestness or feeling of interest, indifference.

NON'-DE-SCRIPT, a. and s. That has not been described:—a. Any thing not yet described or classed in physical science.
See Nonc, &c., hereafter.
NON'-E-LEC''-TRIC, a. and s. Not electric, and therefore conducting the electric fluid:—s. A substance which is not an electric, but a conductor of the electric fluid, as the metals.
NON-EN'-TY-TY, 84, 105: s. Non-existence; a thing not existing.
See Nones, hereafter, along with Nonagon, &c., and also None-such, hereafter.
NON'-EX-IST''-ENCE, (-égz-íst''-énce, 154) s. In-existence, state of not existing.
See Nonilion, hereafter, along with Nonagon, &c.
NON'-JU-ROH, (-j'oo'-ror, 109, 38) s. One who, conceiving James II. unjustly deposed, refused to swear obedience to those who succeeded him.
NON'-ju-ring, a. Not swearing allegiance to the Hanoverian family.
NON-NAT''-U-RALS, (-nátch''-oo-ráls, 147, 143) s. pl. 1, Air; 2, meat and drink; 3, sleep and watching; 4, motion and rest; 5, retention; and 6, excretion; which six things are neither naturally constitutive nor merely destructive, but promote health or produce disease according to their use or abuse.
NON'-OB-SER''-VANCE, 151: s. Failure to observe.
NON'-OB-STAN''-TE, [Lat.] ad. Notwithstanding: it is sometimes used substantively to signify a clause in a patent, &c., licensing a thing to be done which some former statute would otherwise restrain.
NON'-PA-REIL'', (-rél, [Fr.] 120) s. That which

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

Consonants: mish-ün, i. e. mission, 165: vish-ün, i. e. vision, 165: shín, 166: shén, 166.

NON-

has no equal,—applied as a name to a sort of apple, and to a printing type, formerly the smallest, though now there are two smaller.

NON-PAY'-MENT, s. Omission of payment.

NON'-PLUS, [Lat.] s. A state in which one is at a stand or can do no more; a puzzle, a complete perplexity.

To Non'-plus, v. a. To puzzle, to confound.

NON'-PROS., s. The state of a suit at law when the plaintiff does not choose to proceed: non-prosequitur.

NON-RES'-I-DENT, (-rēz'-ē-dēnt, 151) a. and s. Not residing at the proper place:—a. One who does not reside at the place of his official duties, applied particularly to clergymen who live away from their cures.

Non-res'-i-dence, s. State of being non-resident.

NON'-RE-SIST'-ANCE, (-zist'-ānce, 151) s. The principle of yielding without resistance to every act of power exerted by the hereditary and anointed king; passive obedience.

Non-re-sist'-ant, a. Passively obedient.

NON-SANE', a. Unsound in mind.

NON'-SENSE, 153: s. That which does not express a meaning, applied to forms of language; that which, seeming of some importance, is really of none, applied to things. [The use of the word in the latter sense is not elegant.]

Non-sen'-si-cal, a. Unmeaning; foolish.

Non-sen'-si-cal-ly, ad. Absurdly; foolishly.

Non-sen'-si-cal-ness, s. State of being nonsensical.

NON-SEN'-SITIVE, 105: a. Wanting sensation.

NON'-SO-LU'-TION, 109, 89: s. Failure of solution.

NON-sol'-vent, a. and s. Not solving, in the sense of paying; insolvent:—a. An insolvent.

NON-SPA'-RING, 41: a. All-destroying, merciless.

NON'-SUIT, s. A renunciation of a suit by the plaintiff or defendant, most commonly upon the discovery of some error or defect when the matter is so far proceeded in that the jury are ready to deliver their verdict: it differs from a retract in that the latter is positive, but the other negative; the nonsuit is a mere default and neglect of the plaintiff, and therefore he is allowed to begin his suit again on payment of costs; but by a retract the plaintiff for ever loses his action.

To Non'-suit, v. a. To determine or record that the plaintiff drops his suit, as when, being called in court, he neglects to answer, or when he neglects to deliver his declaration: in such cases an entry is made on the record, which amounts to a judgement of the court that the plaintiff has dropped his suit.

NON-U'-SANCE, (-zānce, 151) s. Neglect of using.

NON-U'-ser, s. A not using. [Blackstone.]

NONAGON=nōn'-ā-gōn, 18: s. A figure having nine angles and sides.

NON-A-GES'-I-M-AL, a. Ninetieth, applied specially to the 90th degree, or the highest point of the ecliptic. See NONOS and NONX hereafter.

NONES, 143: s. pl. A day in each month of the Roman calendar so called as being the ninth inclusive before the Ides: it corresponds to the 7th of March, May, July, Oct., and to the 5th of all the other months:—See also NON.

NON-IL-L'-ION, (nōn-il'-yōn, 90) s. The number of nine millions of millions.

NONCE=nōnce, s. Purpose, intent, occasion, design. [Obs. or colloq.]

NONCHALANCE, &c.—See under NON-.

NONE, nūn, 107: a. and pron. Not one, used of persons or things; not any, anciently used instead of no before a vowel: None of often signifies emphatically nothing:—through the frequent ellipsis of the substantive, it has become a pronoun in many forms of construction, and is in consequence used as a plural quite as frequently as a singular.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Vowels: gātē-wāy: chāp-mān: pā-pā: lāw: gōōd: j'wō, i. e. jew, 55: a, e, i, &c. mute, 171.

NOS

NONE'=SUCH, s. A thing unequalled;—among other applications, the name of a sort of apple.

NONES, NONILLION.—See along with Nonagon, &c.

NONJUROR, &c.—See under NON-.

NONNY, nōn'-nēy, s. A ninny. Nin'-ny-nōn'-ny is one of the colloquial alliterations or jingles so frequent in our language.

NON OBSTANTE, &c.—See under NON-.

NOODLE, nōō'-dl, 101: s. A noddy, a fool.

NOOK, nōōk, 118: s. A corner.

NOON=nōōn, s. and a. The middle of the day when the sun is in the meridian; Dryden and other poets call midnight the noon of night; in the plural, under the altered form Nones, it seems to have signified noon-tide prayers: (See the usual sense of Nones above, along with Nonagon, &c.):—adj. Meridional.

Noon'-ing, s. Repose at noon; repast at noon.

Noon'-day, s. and a. Mid-day:—adj. Meridional.

Noon'-stead, (-stēd, 120) s. Sun's station at noon.

Noon'-tide, s. and a. Mid-day:—adj. Meridional.

NOOSE, nōōz, 151, 189: s. A running knot which binds the closer the more it is drawn.

To Noose, v. a. To tie in a noose, to entrap.

NOPE=nōpe, s. Bullfinch or redtail.

NOR=nor, 37: conj. The correlative to not and to neither: Shakspeare often uses nor where we must now use and, correspondently with the Saxon idiom; neither is sometimes included in nor; it is sometimes poetically used for neither; it sometimes begins a sentence in prose with a reference to some negative meaning, expressed or implied, which has preceded.

NORMAL=nor'-māl, a. According to a rule or principle; hence, because drawn according to a square or rule, perpendicular; hence also, teaching rules or first principles.

NORMAN, NORROY.—See under North.

NORTH=north, 37: s. and a. The point opposite to the sun in the meridian:—adj. Being in the north, northern.

Nor'-ther-ly, ad. Being towards the north: Nor'-thern-ly is not now used.

☞ The vocalizing of the consonant element in the middle of this and the following two words is remarkable: the practice extends colloquially to Northwards, Northward, when the w is sunk; but in deliberate pronunciation, when the w is preserved, the original pronunciation of North is maintained, as it likewise is in the other compounds.

Nor'-thern, a. Being in the north.

Nor'-thing, s. The motion or distance of a planet from the equinoctial northward.

North'-ward, (north'-word, 140, 168) a. and ad. (See the note at Northerly.) Being towards the north:—adv. Towards the north: as an adverb, it often takes the form North'-wards, (143).

NORTH-EAST', s. and a. The point between north and east:—adj. Being between north and east.

North'-west', (colloq. nor'-wēst') s. and a. The point between north and west:—adj. Being between north and west: North'-west'-ern has the same meaning.

NORTH'-STAR, s. The pole star.

NORTH'-WIND, (-wind) s. The wind from the north.

NOR'-MAN, s. and a. A north man, applied at first to a Norwegian, and then to a native of Normandy: a sailor uses it as a name for a wooden bar on which the cable is fastened to the windlass:—adj. Pertaining to Normandy.

NOR'-NOX, 129, 30: s. Literally, north-king, the title of the third king at arms, whose jurisdiction lies to the north of the Trent.

NOR-we'-oi-AN, 90: s. and a. A native of Norway:—adj. Belonging to Norway.

NOR-we'-yan, 12: a. Norwegian. [Shaks.]

NOSE=nōzē, 151: s. The prominence on the face,

NOT

which is the organ of scent and the emunctory of the parts near it; the end of some thing, as of bellows; scent, sagacity: To lead by the nose, to lead as a bear is led, with blind obedience to the attracting force: To thrust one's nose into any affair, to meddle impertinently with it: To put one's nose out of joint, to put one out in the affections of another.

To Nose, v. a. and n. To scent, to smell; to thrust the nose as in face of, to face:—new. [Shaks.] To look insolent.

Nosed, 114: a. Having a nose, as long-nosed, flat-nosed; in some old authors, having sagacity.

Nose'-less, a. Having no nose.

Nose'-BRED, s. A name given to a plant.

Nose'-YISH, s. A fish with a broad snout.

Nose'-GAY, s. A bunch of flowers for smell and gay appearance.

Nose'-SMART, s. Nasturtium, which see.

Nose'-THRILL, s. Nose-cavity, nostril. [Spenser.]

Nose'-LE, (nōz'-l, 101) s. Literally, a little nose, —the extremity of something, as of bellows.

Nose'-TRIL, s. One of the two apertures of the nose, originally called a noethril.

NOSOLOGY, nō-sōl'-ō-jēy, 87: s. The doctrine of diseases; more particularly, the classification of diseases.

No-sol'-o-gist, s. One skilled in nosology.

No-sol'-o-gy-i-cal, 88, 92: a. Pertaining to nosology.

No-sol'-o-gy-i-cal, 88: a. Creating disease. [Arbuthnot.]

NOSTRIL.—See under Nose.

NOSTRUM=nōs'-trūm, s. Literally, that which is ours,—a medicine which is kept for profit in the hand of the inventor or his assign; a quack medicine.

NOT=nōt, ad. The particle of negation or refusal; it denotes cessation; not only, elliptically.

Not'-with-stand'-ing, conj. Not hindering; not obstructing; nevertheless, however; less properly, although.

NOTABLE, &c., NOTARY, &c., NOTATION.—See under Note.

NOTCH=nōtch, s. A nick, a hollow cut in any thing: Swift uses it in one place for niche.

To Notch, v. a. To cut in small hollows.

Notch'-weed, s. A herb, orach.

N'OTE, for Ne wote, Know not; could not. [Spenser.]

NOTE=nōt, s. A mark or token by which something is known; abbreviation, symbol; a mark made in a book indicating something worthy of notice; hence, a short remark or commentary; a minute or memorandum; annotation, commentary; a short letter, a billet; a diplomatic communication; a subscribed paper acknowledging a debt and promising payment; a character or symbol in music: (See lower:) notice, heed: (See lower.)

To Note, v. a. To mark, to put a note upon; to make a memorandum of, to enter in a book:—See also lower: in northern use, with a different etymology, it signifies to push or strike.

No'-ter, s. He who takes notes.

Note'-book, 118: s. A book for entering memoranda.

No'-ta-ry, s. Among the ancient Romans, a person employed to take notes of contracts, trials, and proceedings in public courts; in modern usage, an officer authorized to note and so to attest writings of any kind, and in particular to note the non-payment of an accepted bill: he is generally called a notary-public.

No-ta'-ri-al, 90, 41: a. Pertaining to a notary; done or taken by a notary.

No-ta'-tion, 89: s. The art or practice of signifying any thing by marks or characters; particularly of signifying numbers by their appropriate signs in arithmetic and algebra; in another sense, the notice or knowledge of a word which is afforded by its or-ginal use or etymology; and hence an argument drawn from etymology.

NOTE, s. A character in music denoting a sound; the sound itself; hence, tune, voice, melodious sounds:—See also above, and lower.

To Note, v. a. To set down in musical characters.

NOTE, s. Notice, heed, observation; Bacon uses it for state of being observed; reputation, consequence, distinction:—See also above.

To Note, v. a. To notice with particular care, to observe, to attend to.

No'-ted, a. Observed; remarkable; much known, eminent, celebrated.

No'-ted-ly, ad. With notice. [Shaks.]

No'-ted-ness, s. Conspicuousness.

Note'-less, a. Not attracting notice.

Note'-wor-thy, (-wur-thēy, 141) a. Deserving notice.

No'-ta-ble, a. and s. Remarkable, worthy of notice; memorable: observable: (at present scarcely used but in irony: it has another meaning with a different pronunciation:—See lower:)—a. A notable person or thing; [Unusual:] in France, one of the men of note or rank summoned from different provinces by the king under the old monarchy to meet for discussion on public business, who constituted an assembly distinct both from the States-general, and from the Parliament of Paris.

No'-ta-bly, ad. In a notable manner.

No'-ta-ble-ness, s. Quality of being notable.

No'-a-ble, 92: a. Careful, thrifty, bustling; applied to men, but much more frequently to women. [Colloq.]

No'-a-bly, ad. With bustling activity and thrift.

No'-a-ble-ness, s. Quality of being notable.

See Nothing, &c., hereafter.

No'-tice, (nō'-tiss, 105) s. Remark, heed, observation, regard; information, intelligence.

To No'-tice, v. a. To note, to heed, to observe.

No'-tice-a-ble, 101: a. Observable.

To No'-ti-fy, 6: v. n. and a. To make known, with to:—ad. To declare.

No'-ti-fi-ca'-tion, 89: s. The act of notifying; notice given in words or writing; an advertisement.

No'-tion, &c.—See lower in the class.

No-to'-ri-ous, 90, 47, 120: a. Publicly known; manifest to the world; usually, as at present understood, it means known to disadvantage, as a notorious rogue, a notorious crime; hence, it is often wrongly used in the sense of atrocious.

No-to'-ri-ous-ly, ad. Publicly; publicly so as to be deemed disgraceful.

No-to'-ri-ous-ness, s. State of being notorious.

No-to'-ri-e-ty, 84, 105: s. State of being publicly known; public exposure.

No'-tion, 89: s. Literally and properly, that rational notice or knowledge of a thing which consists in a perception of relations which it bears to other things, and which is of such a nature that one man's notion of the same thing may be very different from another's, inasmuch as he may perceive different relations, or, perceiving the same, may also perceive many more relations; a notion therefore differs from an idea, (the modern, not the ancient Platonic idea,) and from an image, and from a conception; for these imply nothing more than the mental representation of a thing as perceived at some one past time; with less strict application, idea, image, conception; sentiment, opinion, purpose: Shakspeare frequently uses it to signify understanding or intellectual power generally.

No'-tion-al, a. Being in the mind only; visionary.

No'-tion-al-ly, ad. In mind only.

No'-tion-ist, s. One who holds an ungrounded opinion. [Bp. Hopkins.]

No'-tion-al'-i-ty, 84, 105: s. Empty, ungrounded opinion. [Glanvil.]

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

Consonants: mīsh-ūn, i. e. mission, 165: vīzh-ūn, i. e. vision, 165: thīn, 166: thēn, 166.

To Nus'-tle.—See To Nus'-tle, lower.

See Nut and its relations in the next class.

See Nutation in the class after the next.

Nu'-TRI-CA'-TION, 89: s. Manner of feeding or being fed. [Brown.]

Nu'-tri-ent, a. and s. Nourishing:—s. That which nourishes.

Nu'-tri-ment, s. That which nourishes,—food.

Nu'-tri-men'-tal, a. Alimential.

Nu'-tri-tive, 105: a. Nourishing.

Nu'-tri-ture, 147: s. Quality of nourishing. [Harvey.]

Nu'-TRIT'-ious, (nū'-trish'-ūs, 147, 120) a. Having the quality of nourishing.

Nu'-tri'-ion, 89: s. The act or process of promoting the growth or repairing the waste of bodies; less properly, nutriment.

To NUS'-ZLE, 101: v. a. (Compare To Nourish, under Nourish.) To nurse up: it has another meaning, with a different origin.—See it hereafter.

NUT=nūt, s. The fruit of certain trees and shrubs, consisting of a hard shell enclosing a kernel; in mechanics, a small cylinder or other shaped body with teeth or projections forming the inner body which corresponds with an outward one.

To Nut, v. a. To gather nuts.

Nut'-ting, a. and s. Pertaining to nut-gathering.—s. Nut-gathering.

Nut'-brown, a. Brown like an old nut.

Nut'-crack'-ers, 143: a. pl. An instrument to break nuts.

Nut'-gall, (-gāwl, 112) s. Hard excrescence of the oak.

Nut'-hatch, s. The common name of a sort of birds: they are also called Nut'-jobber and Nut'-pecker.

Nut'-hook, 118: s. A hooked pole or stick for gathering nuts: in Shakespeare's time a cant name for a pilferer, or, as some think, for a catchpole.

Nut'-tree, s. A tree that bears nuts.

Nut'-shell, s. Shell of a nut; small compass; any thing of no value.

Nut'-meg, s. A kind of aromatic nut brought from the East Indies, and much used in cookery.

NUTATION, nū-tā'-shūn, 89: s. A nodding: in astronomy, a tremulous motion of the axis of the earth.

NUTRICATION, NUTRIENT, NUTRIMENT, NUTRITIOUS, To NUZZLE, &c.—See under Nurse.

To NUZZLE, nūz'-zl, 101: v. a. and n. (Compare To Nourish.) To ensnare as in a noose or trap; to put a ring into the nose, as of a hog, to prevent his digging; to rout up with the nose:—nsw. To go with the nose down like a hog.—See also under Nurse: there is often a mingled sense in using this word, which the notions derived from the several sources unite to form: thus a child is said to nuzzle in the mother's bosom; where, moreover, to nestle enters into the notion, and this would, in fact, be the more proper and elegant word.

NYCTALOPS, nick'-tā-lōps, s. One who, according to Hippocrates, sees best by night; but Galen and others give a contrary sense to the word, making it signify one who sees in the day-time, but is quite blind at night.

Nyc'-ta-lo'-py, s. A disease of the eye.

NYE=nȳ, 106: s. A brood as of pheasants.

NYMPH, nīm-f, 163: s. A goddess of the woods, meadows, or waters; in poetic style, a female, a lady.

Nymph'-ish, a. Pertaining to nymphs; like a nymph. [Dryden.]

Nymph'-like, a. As of a nymph. [Milton.]

NYMPHA, nīm'-fā, 163: s. The chrysalis of insects: the form Nymph is also used.

NYS, nīz, 151: ad. Ne is, not is, none is. [Spenser.]

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Vowels: gāu'-wāy: chāp'-mān: pā-pā': lāw: gōd: j'ōō, i. e. jew, 55: a, e, i, &c. mute, 171.

O is popularly the fourteenth letter of the alphabet, though really the fifteenth: see I: its sounds are the 7th, 8th, 17th, 18th, 37th, 38th, 47th, and 48th elements of the scheme prefixed; but it very often deviates from these its more regular sounds: see Prin. 107 and 116: moreover, by reduplication it becomes a digraph for the 37th element and its varieties, the 28th, the 31st and 32nd: prefixed to i or y it forms a digraph for the 39th and 30th elements; and prefixed to v or w, a digraph for the 31st and 32nd. As abbreviations, O, S, stand for Old Style; OB, signify Obviti, Obviti, or Obviti, died: O is the usual mark for a cipher or nought: in Shakespeare's time it was often written singly and pronounced o to signify a circle or some figure near to a circle, in which use it was sometimes written oe: See Prin. 189.

O=ō, interj. It denotes calling to, or exclamation; it denotes wishing in such forms as "O! that he were here!" but if any strong emotion enter into the sentiment, the proper orthography is Oh: as a noun, see the remark above.

OAD=ōad, s. Word; which see. [B. Jon.]

OAF=ōaf, s. A foolish child left by fairies in place of one more witty; hence, a dolt, a blockhead, an idiot.

Oaf'-ish, a. Stupid, dull, doltish.

O-PIN'-I-A'-TRE, (ō-pīn'-ē-ā'-tur, 170) a. Ob-stinate, stubborn. [Milton: prose. Bentley.] Opin'iatre and Opin'iatrous are older forms of the same word: Barrow uses Opiniatre substantively to signify an obstinate person.

O-pin'-i-a'-tre-ty, s. Obstinacy, stubbornness. [Pope.] Locke and some later authors use O-pin'-ia-try, which may receive an English pronunciation; but, as Johnson says, in none of its forms is this word wanted.

O-PIN'-ION, (ō-pīn'-yūn, 146, 18) s. That which is opined or thought,—distinctively, favourable judgement; hence, reputation; it always implies a bias or tendency of the mind independently of the facts which lead to the judgement; if there are no facts, or none sufficient for a decided judgement, the state of mind which follows is either neutral, (a state perhaps hardly possible,—to an undisciplined mind assuredly impossible,) or is an opinion; and an opinion will be more or less strong according to the facts on which it rests, till it amounts in some cases to absolute belief or moral certainty—in others, which admit of it, to physical (i. e. experimental) certainty: to the other kind of certainty, namely, metaphysical or mathematical certainty, which is nothing but the recognition that certain truths are contained in, or constituted by, those notions which the mind itself originates, Opinion can have no proper relation.

To O-pin'-ion, v. a. To think. [Out of use.]

O-pin'-ioned, 114: a. Attached to particular opinions, conceited. [South.]

O-pin'-ion-ist, s. One fond of his own notions, or unduly attached to his own opinions. [Glanvil.]

Or'-a-to'-ri-o, s. An Italian word signifying an oratory or place for prayers; also applied as the name of a species of drama or composition in dialogue on sacred subjects, accompanied by vocal and instrumental music of a solemn character.

Or'-a-tor-y, s. A little chapel or place to pray in:—See also lower.

OR-A'-TION, 89: s. A speech; distinctively, a speech of art and of some display delivered on a special occasion, and so discriminated from a sermon, from a barrister's address, from a speech to a deliberative assembly, and from a popular harangue, though in the generic sense all of these are orations; a speech in writing that has been spoken or is proposed to be spoken: Donne uses To Orat-ion, (to make an oration,) but the word is not received.

Or'-a-tor, 86, 92: s. A speaker; a public speaker; distinctively, an eloquent public speaker; one appointed specially to speak for others, or to make formal addresses on public occasions; in chancery proceedings, a petitioner:—See the words preceding Orat-ion.

Or'-a-tress, s. A female orator: the word scarcely occurs; Or-a-tris still more rarely.

Or'-a-tor-y, s. The art of speaking well, particularly in public; (see Elocution;) eloquence; exercise of eloquence:—See this word also above, before Orat-ion.

Or'-a-to'-ri-al, 90: a. Oratorical: Oratorious occurs, but is little authorised.

Or'-a-to'-ri-al-ly, ad. Oratorially.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Or'-a-tor'-i-cal, 88: a. Bestitting an orator; rhetorical.

Or'-a-tor'-i-cal-ly, ad. In an oratorical manner.

ORANGE, ór'-áing-e-ór'-éngt, 111, 119: s. and a. A tree of warm climates which produces a well-known fruit with a yellow rind; the fruit itself:—adj. Belonging to an orange; coloured as an orange.

Or'-ange-ade', s. Strictly, drink made of orange-juice, as lemonade of lemon-juice; less strictly, lemonade; sherbet.

Or'-an-ger-y, s. A plantation of orange-trees.

Or'-ange-musk', (a species of pear;) Or'-ange-pest'; Or'-ange-law'ny, (a colour between yellow and brown;) Or'-ange-wife', or Or'-ange-woman, &c.

ORANG-OUTANG, ó-ráng'-oo-táng', 125: s. The great ape or satyr, an animal which in outward conformation remarkably approaches the human form; it sometimes grows to the height of six feet, but is generally smaller.

ORATION, ORATOR, &c.—See under Oral.

ORB=orb, 37: s. An orbicular or circular body; a sphere; a circle; the revolution of a circular body; a period.

To Orb, v. a. To form into a circle.

Or'-bed, a. Orbicular, round, circular.

Or'-by, 105: a. Resembling an orb. [Chapman.]

Or'-bic, a. Circular, spherical.

Or'-bic-u-lar, 84, 34: a. Spherical, circular.

Or'-bic-u-lar-ly, ad. Spherically.

Or'-bic-u-lar-ness, s. State of being orbicular.

Or'-bic-u-lá'-ted, a. Moulded into an orb.

Or'-bic-u-lá'-tion, 89: s. State of being moulded into an orb or circle.

Or'-bit, s. The line supposed to be described by the revolution of a planet; Young, in one place, improperly uses it for orb; in anatomy, the cavity within which the eye is situated.

Or'-bit-al, 12: a. Pertaining to an orbit: this is better than Orbit'nal, but neither word is yet much used.

ORBATE=or'-báte, a. (Compare Orphan, with which this word is allied, though, from the absurd English mode of pronouncing the aspirated Greek p, (see 143,) the oral affinity is obscured.) Bereaved; fatherless, childless.

Or'-bi-tude, } 105: s. Bereavement by loss of Or'-bi-ty, } parents, or of children.

Or-bá'-tion, s. Orbitude; poverty. [Cockeram.]

ORC=ork, 37: s. A species of whale.

ORCHAL—See Orchil.

ORCHANET, or'-ká-nét, 161: s. A herb.

ORCHARD=ortch'-ard, 33: s. A hort yard or garden yard, a garden of fruit trees.

Orch'-ard-ing, s. Cultivation of orchards. [Evelyn.]

ORCHESTRE, or'-kés-tur, 81, 161, 159: s. The place where the musicians are stationed at a public show; the band of musicians: the word comes to us immediately from the French; the original word in Greek is Or-ches-tra, which, in the ancient Greek drama, was the central part of the theatre, or the modern pit, where the dances were performed: when the latter is meant, or when the word has reference to dancing, or when it occurs under the latter spelling in old poets, the word must be accented on the second syllable.

Or'-ches-tral, 82: a. Pertaining to an orchestre; suitable for, or performed in, an orchestre.

ORCHIL=ortch'-il, s. A lichen from the rocks of the Canary islands which yields a rich purple tincture: the blue test called litmus is procured from it.

ORCHIS, or'-kls, 161: s. A plant of a variety of kinds, called foolstons.

ORD=ord, s. Anciently, a beginning; whence the phrase Odds (orts) and ends; hence, an edge; and hence, sharpness. [Obs.]

To ORDAIN, &c.—See under Order.

ORDEAL=or'-dē-ál, s. A form of trial among the ancient rude nations of Europe, to determine guilt or innocence by fire or water, the methods being various: that by fire, in general, required the person suspected to walk blindfolded, without burning himself, over nine red-hot ploughshares at unequal distances; that by water, to plunge his bare arm into boiling water without scalding it: hence, probably, the phrase, To go through fire and water.

ORDER=or'-der, 37, 36: s. Regular disposition or methodical arrangement, observed as an effect; a law, mandate, precept, or command, considered as the cause: hence, established process; proper state; settled mode; a rank or class; a number of persons forming a dignified class; a number of persons forming a religious class; the state of being under ecclesiastical rule, commonly expressed by the plural, as, To be in orders; because to be in full-orders requires two ordinations, that of a deacon and that of a priest: in architecture, any one of the five systems, to which the parts and proportions of columns and their appendages are reduced: hence also, rule, regulation; regular government; means to an end, measures, care.

To Or'-der, v. a. and n. To regulate, to methodise, to systematize; to lead, to conduct, to manage; to direct, to command; in old authors, to ordain to sacerdotal function:—new. To give command or direction.

Or'-der-er, s. One that orders; a methodiser.

Or'-der-ing, s. Disposition, distribution.

Or'-der-ly, a. ad. and s. Methodical, regular; observant of order; according with established method; containing military regulations or orders:—ad. Methodically, regularly:—s. A private soldier or non-commissioned officer who attends on a superior officer to carry orders or messages.

Or'-der-li-ness, s. Quality of being orderly.

Or'-der-less, a. Without order.

ORDINABILITY, &c.—See lower in the class.

Or'-di-nal, a. and s. Noting order, as second, third:—a. A number denoting order, as third; a book containing orders: a ritual.

See ORDINANCE, &c., lower in the class.

Or-don'-nance, 12: s. Disposition of figures in a picture, [Dryden:] disposition in any work of art, including works of elegant literature, as flowing from predetermined principles of taste. [Quar. Rev., vol. xlix. p. 359.]

To OR-DAIN, v. u. Primarily, to set in its place as one of a predetermined series; hence, to appoint, to decree, to settle, to institute; in a special application, to invest with ministerial function or sacerdotal power.

Or-dain'-a-ble, a. That may be ordained.—See also Ordainable lower in the class.

Or-dain'-er, s. One who ordains.

Or-dain'-ing, a. That ordains, or has a right or power to ordain.

ORDINAL—See higher in the class.

Or'-di-nant, a. Ordaining, decreeing. [Out of use.]

Or'-di-nance, s. A decree, appointment, law, rule, precept; a practice, rite, or ceremony, in consequence of a law; anciently, a canon, in which signification the word is now distinguished by a difference of spelling. See Ordinance lower in its place. It is supposed this strange appropriation of the word arose from a mistake between canon and canons, words pronounced exactly alike; and as canon signified an ordinance, a canon was translated an ordinance.

ORDINARY, &c.—See lower in the class.

To Or'-di-nate, v. a. To appoint. [Daniel.]

Or'-di-nate, a. and s. Regular, methodical:—s. One of the lines which, being drawn perpendicularly to the axis of a curve, meet the curve in a number of points.

Or'-di-nate-ly, ad. In a methodical manner. [Sir T. Elyot.]

Or'-di-na'-tive, 105: a. Giving order. [Sherwood.]

Or'-di-na-ble, 105, 98, 101: a. Capable of being appointed. Compare Ordain'able above.

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

Consonants: mish-ün, i. e. mission, 165: vish-ün, i. e. vision, 165: thín, 166: thén, 166.

Or-di-na-tion, s. Established order or tendency consequent on a decree; specially, the act of ordaining, or investing with sacerdotal power.

Or-di-na-bil-i-ty, 84, 105: s. Quality of being ordainable, capability of being appointed.

Or-di-na-r-y, 129, 12, 105: a. and s. According to order, methodical; common, usual; hence, of common rank; hence, also, plain, not handsome:—s. He or that which is established; hence, specially, a judge of ecclesiastical causes, who is, properly, the bishop of the district, as the archbishop is the ordinary of all the districts within his province; it is likewise applied to every commissary or official of the bishop; it is applied to the clergyman who is attendant in ordinary upon condemned malefactors in Newgate, to prepare them for death; it means, as in this last definition, actual and constant office; settled establishment; specially, also, a regular meal established at a certain price; hence, the price itself; in heraldry, any figure of ordinary use.

Or-di-na-r-i-ly, ad. Commonly, usually.

ORDINATE, &c.—See higher in the class.

ORDNANCE=ord'-nāns, s. (See Ordinance in the preceding class of words.) Cannon.

ORDNANCE.—See under Order above.

Os-ten'-tous, a. Ostentatious. [Evelyn.]

Os-ten'-si-BLE, (-cè-bl, 152, 105, 101) a. Literally, that may be shown; hence the usual meaning, colourable, plausible, held forth.

Os-ten'-si-bly, ad. With appearance.

Os-ten'-si-bil'-i-ty, 84, 105: s. The quality or state of being ostensible.

Os-ten'-sive, (-civ) a. Showing, betokening.

OSTEOCOLLA=ɔs'-tè-ò-cõl'-lâ, s. (Compare Osseous, &c.) Literally, bone-glue, a fossil, carbonate of lime formed by incrustation on the stem of a plant, and said to be good for uniting fractured bones.

Os'-TR-O-COPE, s. Aching of the bones.

Os'-TR-OI'-O-GRY, s. That part of anatomy which treats of the bones; the system of animal bones.

Os'-tè-oi'-o-gist, s. One versed in osteology: Ortoe'ogor is an older word, but at present less used.

Os'-tè-o-log'-i-cal, 88: a. Pertaining to osteology.

OSTIARY, ɔst'-yär-äy, 146, 147, 105: s. (Compare Oscitant.) The mouth or opening by which a river discharges itself into the sea or a lake.

OSTLER, ɔs'-ler, 156: s. An hostler, which see; and Ost'-ler-y, (the place belonging to an hostler) compare with Hostelry.

OSTMEN=ɔst'-mën, s. pl. East men, as the Danish settlers in Ireland were called: so the Ostracots were the Goths from the East.

OSTRACISM, ɔs'-trâ-cizm, 158: s. Sentence of banishment by votes as practised in ancient Athens, each vote being signified by an oyster-shell, on which the voter wrote the name of the person; hence banishment, expulsion.

To Os'-tra-cize, v. a. To banish, to expel.

Os'-TRA-CITE, s. An oyster-shell in its fossil state.

OSTRICH=ɔs'-tritch, 149: s. A very large bird that uses its wings in running, not for flight, that has extraordinary powers of digestion, and the feathers of whose wings are much esteemed.

OTACOUS TIC=ɔ-tâ-cow'-stik, a. and s. That assists perception by the ears.—s. An instrument to assist the ears in hearing; also called an O'-ta-cous'-ti-con.

O'-TAL-GR, or O-TAL'-GI-A, s. The ear-ache.

OTHER, uth'-er, 116: adj. and pron. Not the same; not this, different; not this, the contrary: it is often used elliptically, and hence has become a noun or pronoun capable of the plural termination:—pron. Not I or he, but some one else; it is often correlative to each, which two words sometimes come together, and may conveniently be considered one compound word: see the remarks under One.

Oth'-er-gates, ad. In another manner. [Obs.]

Oth'-er-guise, (-guize, 151) ad. Of another kind; sometimes corrupted into Other-guess.

Oth'-er-where, (-hwär, 56, 102) ad. In some other place or places. [Milton.]

Oth'-er-while, 56: }

Oth'-er-whiles, 143: } ad. At other times.

OTTER=ɔt'-ter, s. An amphibious animal that preys on fish.

OTTO=ɔt'-tò, s. A corruption of Otr, an Ambic word signifying quintessence, and usually applied to the oily aromas extracted from flowers; some persons have lately chosen to spell it Ottar.

OTTOMAN, ɔt'-tò-män, a. and s. Pertaining to the Turks, from Othman, or Osman, a commander or sultan of the tribe about the year 1300.—s. A sciol, such as is used in Turkey.

OUCH=owtch, s. The collet in which a precious stone is set; a carcanet; an ornament of gold; it was also used to signify the blow given by a boar's tusk. [Obs.]

OUGHT, Anything.—See Aught.

I, he, they, &c. OUGHT, ɔwt, 126, 162: } v. a.

Thou OUGHTEST, ɔwt'-est, } and n.

act. Owed, was bound to pay; had a right to; (in these senses, in which it is the old preterit of To Owe, it is obsolete:)—neu. Am, art, &c. bound by duty,—fit, necessary,—in such circumstances as to establish or to have established a fitness: such is the modern sense of the verb, in which it is always in the present tense, notwithstanding the past meaning which the whole context may express; thus, in the phrases Ought he not to suffer, and Ought he not to have suffered, the finite verb is in the same present tense, and the preterit meaning in the latter phrase is expressed, contrarily to the usual practice, by the verb governed, and not by the governing verb.

OUNCE=ownce, s. A weight, originally a twelfth part; in Troy weight it is the twelfth part of a pound, but in Avordupois it is the sixteenth part.

OUNCE=ownce, s. A lynx.

OUNDED=own'-dêd, a. Waving. [Chaucer.] Ound'ing had the same meaning; Ound'y in heraldry is waving.

OUPHE, ɔf, 127, 163, 189: s. A fairy, an elf.

Os'-phen, a. Elfish.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Vowels: gât'-wáy: cháp'-mân: pâ-pâ: lân: gôd: j'ô, i. e. few; 55: a, e, i, &c. note, 171.

OUT-

OUR=ower, 133, 53: } pron. (See I.) Pertaining OURS, owrs, 143: } to us; belonging to us: the first form is a pronominal adjective, or an adjective pronoun, as the grammarian may choose to name it;
the other form is a possessive pronoun of the third person; as, Ours is here: where it cannot be said a noun in the third person is understood; for if such noun were inserted, it would change the word to our: a proof that the meaning of the noun was comprehended is the pronoun, and not understood after it.

Our-self, prom. It is used only in the regal style.
Our-selves, 189, 143: prom. The plural of Myself.
OURANOGRAPHY, ow'-răn-ôg'-ră-fēy, 163:
s. A description of the heavens.

OUSE.—See Oose.

OUSEL, ô'-zl, 127, 114: s. A blackbird.

To OUST=owst, v. a. To take away, to remove;
to eject, to dispossess.

Oust'-er, s. Dispossession: Oust'-ter-le-main', (Law French, pron. as English,) the delivery of lands out of a guardian's hands.

OUT=owt, 31: a. adv. and interj. External, not in; not within, gone forth, come forth, issued; gone from some state; going on to the issue of a state;
hence, the notion of finishing or completing, and the sense of completely, which it often expresses: in these and every other sense, the original meaning of issuing from an interior or present state is kept in view, with more or less of literal or figurative import: some expressions are elliptical; thus Out at heels implies ex-posure of the flesh at the heels, and figuratively, bareness of income: Out of pocket means money out of the pocket: To cry out on any one is to tell him to get out of presence or away; hence Out becomes an interjection: when Out precedes of, it is considered to form a compound preposition; but of is the only real preposition, and Out still retains its original import, which, though it may sometimes be interpreted by from, sometimes by not in, sometimes by beyond, &c., is still correspondent to the general sense above stated: Out of hand signifies immediately, implying that the affair is now in hand, and on the point of being out of it, i. e.
performed: as a prefix, the import of Out, with such derivative extensions as have been described, remains unaffected throughout all the words compounded with it; in most of them it conveys the meaning of going beyond or surpassing some state or action which is figuratively to issue from it; in others its meaning is literal, or nearly so, betokening emission, exclusion, or something external.

Out'-er, a. comp. degree. Exterior, that is without,
opposed to inner.

Out'-most, } 116: a. super. degree. Remotest
Out'-er-most, } from the midst.

Out'-er-ly, ad. Toward the outside.

Out'-ward, 140, 18: a. ad. and s. External; extrinsic; foreign; carnal, not spiritual.—adv. To the outward parts; to foreign parts.—s. External form.

Out'-wards, 143: ad. The same as Outward.

Out'-ward-ly, ad. Externally; in appearance, not sincerely.

To Out, v. a. To deprive by expulsion; hence, an Out'-er, which properly means an expeller, but has sometimes been used for Outer to signify dispossession:
in vulgar language an Outer is he or that which goes beyond or surpasses.

 OUT-LAW, 81, 26: s. One excluded from the benefit of the law; a robber, a bandit: see Outlawry.
 To OUT-law, v. a. To exclude from protection of law.
 Out-law-ry, s. The being put out of the law: this takes place when a man is cited to a court and refuses to appear; but the law distinguishes between out-laws in capital cases and those of an inferior nature: in personal actions, outlawry does not occasion the party to be looked upon as guilty of the fact, nor does it occasion an entire forfeiture of his real estate, yet it is very penal in its consequences; for he is hereby restrained of his liberty if he can be found, and he forfeits his goods and chattels, and the profits of his lands, till he shall be relawed: if the defendant be a woman, the proceeding is called a waiver; for as women were not sworn to the law by the ancient oath of allegiance at theleet, they could not be called out-lawed:—no man is entitled to kill an outlaw wantonly or wilfully.
 OUT-LAY, 81: s. A laying out; expenditure.
 To OUT-LEAP, v. a. To exceed in leaping.
 Out-leap, 83: s. Sally, flight, escape..

OUT-

To OUT-PREACH, v. a. To surpass in preaching.
 To OUT-PRIZE, v. a. To exceed in estimated worth.
 OUT-RAGE, 81: s. Open violence, tumultuous mischief.
 This is not a compound of the English out and rage, but nevertheless of words in low Latin or middle French which had nearly the same meaning; hence the meaning of the compound is so near to that which would arise from the union of the two English words, that Philips seems to have mistaken its etymology, and uses it in the sense of rage broken forth.
 To Out'-rage, 82: v. a. and n. To injure violently or contumeliously; to insult roughly and tumultuously:—see [Obs.] To commit exorbitances.
 Out-rage'-ous, 120: a. Violent, furious; exorbitant; excessive, enormous.

Com. of Err., tenth line before the conclusion of a l, the editors have properly changed o'er-wrought, which makes little or no sense with the context, into o'er-raught, i. e. o'er-reached; as being the word which the poet, in all probability, used.
O'-VER-YEARED", 114: a. Too old. [Fairfax.]
O'-VER-ZEAL", 114: a. Ruled by too much zeal.
[Fuller.]
O'-ver-zeal"-ous, (-zēl"-ūs, 120) a. Too zealous.

O'-VER-TURE, (-turt, 147) s. An opening, an appeture, an open place, [Spenser, Bp. Hall, Cotton.]; disclosure, [Shaks.]; in modern use, a proposal, something offered to consideration; in a special sense, the opening piece, generally a musical performance, which introduces some principal performance to follow.
OVIDUCT, OVIFORM, OVIPAROUS,
OVOLO.—See among the words following Oval and before Ovation.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Vowels: gāw'-wāy; chāp'-māu; pā-pā': lāw; gōod; j'w, i. e. jew, 55: a, e, i, &c. note, 171.

OVINE==ō'-vīn, a. Pertaining to sheep.

To OWE, ōw==ō, 189, 108: v. a. and n. Originally, as frequently in Shakespeare, to have, to possess, for which we now use own; in modern use, to be held or bound to pay to, to be indebted to; to be under obligation for; to have from, as a consequence of a cause:—syn. To be bound or obliged, for which we now use Ought in the present tense, which was formerly only the preret of To Owe in an active sense:—See Ought.

Ow'-ing, a. Due as a debt; as, He knows what is owing to a father:—Imputable as an effect; as, His misery is owing to his carelessness; i. e. is imputable as an effect to, &c.: if cause would permit, we should use owed in the latter case, and owing only in the former.

OWL==owl, 31: s. A bird that flies chiefly in the night, lives in hollow trees, makes a howling or hooting noise, and eats mice.

Ow'-let, s. An owl; it is not originally the diminutive, but is often so understood.

Owl'-ish, a. Resembling an owl.

Among the compounds are Owl'-light, (glimmering light, such as owls love:) Owl'-like, &c.

OWLER, ōl'-er, 127, 119: s. A corruption probably of weeder, applied to one who carries wool abroad illicitly; hence, one who carries contraband goods: (Swift.)

Owl'-ing, s. An offence against public trade. Blackstone considers the word as related to owl, because the offence of transporting wool or sheep is generally committed at night: such relationship, if real, would require a correspondent pronunciation of the word.

OWN==ōwn==ōw, 7, 108: a. (Compare To Owe, of which it was originally the participle.) Belonging, possessed, peculiar; as, my own, your own, &c., i. e. belonging to me, peculiar to you, &c.; the noun-substantive, though very frequently understood, is never of necessity considered as included in the word, which may therefore always be deemed an adjective.

To Own, v. a. To avow for one's own; to hold by right; to acknowledge.

Own'-er, 36: s. One to whom anything belongs, master, possessor.

Own'-er-ship, s. Property, rightful possession.

PAR-TI-CI-PLE, 105, 101: s. A word participating the properties both of a noun and of a verb.

English verbs have two participles, the first formed by adding ing to the simple infinitive, the second, when the verb is regular, by adding ed. It would have taken up space unnecessarily to have inserted such obvious inflections in the Dictionary, and therefore they are inserted only when, in addition to their use as participles, they have acquired the character of nouns substantive or adjective; but participles of irregular formation are constantly given with the verb they belong to. Certain accommodations of the original word on receiving the new termination, can hardly be accounted irregular: for instance, leaving out the e in write, vote, in order to form wri-ting, vo-ting: in dying the e is not omitted, for the sake of making the word distinct from dyng, the first participle of To die: g is changed into i, (unless a vowel precedes,) on adding ed, as tried from To try; but dyled (linged) is once more an exception, as being spelled dye before the e is added. The doubling of the final consonant in some cases, with the reason for it, is alluded to in the Principles.

The schemes entire, and the principles to which the numbers refer, precede the Dictionary.

Vowels: gāt'-wáy; chǎp'-mǎn; pǎ-pǎ': lǎw; gōd: j'w, i. e. jew, 55: a, e, i, &c. mus, 171.

(194.) It may here be added that in adjectives formed as participles, the same principle is acted upon, and sometimes a consonant is doubled from the notion of a secondary accent on the last syllable, as in car'beret'ed. (On the principle referred to, the doubling of the l would be clearly unnecessary in levelling, modelled, marvellous, crystallize, &c.; but with regard to this letter, the custom of our language seems to make an exception, as well as with regard to a few individual words (referred to Prin. 194) in which other consonants occur in the same situation.

Par'-ti-cip'-i-al, (-yal, 146) 90: a. Having the nature of a participle; formed from a participle.

Par'-ti-cip'-i-al-ly, ad. As a participle.

PARTICLE.—See under Part.

PARTICULAR=par-tick'-ū-lar, a. and s. (See Part, &c.)  brush with which painters produce the completing touches of their art; hence, in figurative style, the art itself; less properly, but more commonly, a pen for writing or drawing without ink, generally made with black lead; this last application has so much usurped the place of the former, that we are mostly obliged to distinguish the original meaning by an epithet; as a hair pencil: from a different etymology, this word in Chaucer signifies a little flag or streamer.
To Pen'-cíl, v. a. To paint; (This is the original and proper meaning;) to mark or draw with a black lead pen.

PEN'-TA-TEUCH, (-tûke, 161) s. The five books of Moses.

PENTECONTER=pen'-tê-côn'-ter, 36: s. That which contains or consists of fifty, a name given to the fifty-oared vessel of ancient Greece, smaller than a trireme.

53 The Greek π being represented in Latin by a, Misford spells this word Pentaconter, and other similar compounds correspondingly; but the example set by Pentecost, and the utility of distinguishing in our adoptions Greek words that mean fifty from those which mean five, surely render the orthography above given far preferable.

PEN'-TE-COST, s. A feast among the Jews, so called as being celebrated on the fiftieth day after the sixteenth of the month Nisan, which was the second day of the feast of the passover: it is now applied to the correspondent season of Whitsuntide, which, reckoning inclusively, is fifty days after Easter.

PEN'-te-cos'-tal, a. Belonging to Whitsuntide: Pentecostals (s. pl.) were oblations formerly made at Pentecost by parishioners to their priest.

PEN'-TE-COS'-TER, s. A military officer of ancient Greece commanding fifty men.

PEN'-te-cos'-tys, (-tis) s. A body of fifty men.

PENTHOUSE=pênt'-howce, 152: s. (Compare Pendent, &c.) A shed hanging out aslope from a main wall.

Pen'-tice, (-tîce, 105) s. A sloping roof. [Wotton.]

Pen'-tile, s. A tile formed for constructing a sloping roof, often called a pantile.

PENULTIMA, pe-nûl'-tê-mă, 105: s. (Compare Peninsula, &c.) That which is almost the last, namely, the last but one, always applied to the last syllable but one of a word: some writers shorten the term into pe-nûl'.

Pe-nûl'-ti-mate, a. Last but one.

PE-NU'-M-BRA, s. That is almost a shadow,—that part of a shadow which is half light.

PENURIOUS, pe-nûr'-t-ûs, 90, 49: a. Niggardly, sparing, not liberal; scant, not plentiful.

Pe-nu'-ri-ous-ly, ad. Sparingly, not plentifully.

Pe-nu'-ri-ous-ness, s. Niggardliness; scantiness.

PEN'-U-RY, 92: s. Want, poverty, indigence.

PEON=pê'-ôn, 18: s. In India, a foot-soldier: hence the word Pawn, one of the common pieces or men at the game of chess.

PEONY, pê'-ô-nêy, 105: s. The name of a flower.

PEOPLE, pê'-pl, 103, 101: s. A nation: (in this sense it is singular, and is capable of the plural form, though this is unusual: see however Rev. x. 11.) persons; (in this sense and its subsequent applications it is plural;) persons of some large class; the commonalty, not the princes or nobles; the vulgar.

To Peo'-ple, v. a. To stock with inhabitants.

Peo'-plish, a. Vulgar. [Chaucer.]

PEPASTIC.—See under Peptic.

PEPPER=pêp'-per, s. An aromatic pungent seed; also its plant: there are three distinct kinds.

To Pep'-per, v. a. To sprinkle with pepper; to mangle with shot or blows laid on thickly as pepper.

Pep'-per-ing, a. Hot, fiery, angry:—s. A beating.

PEP'-PER-MINT, s. Mint eminently hot, an aromatic herb; also a liquor distilled from it.

54 Of the other compounds the following are also names of plants: Pep'-per-grass; Pep'-per-pot; Pep'-per-tree; Pep'-per-wort;—the remaining compounds are Pep'-per-bor, (a caster for sprinkling the powder of pepper;) Pep'-per-cake, (a hot spiced cake;) Pep'-per-corn, (a seed of the pepper-plant; hence, something of inconsiderable value;) Pep'-per-gin, ger-bread, (hot spiced gingerbread;) Pep'-per-mint-tree, (a tree which is a native of New South Wales;) Pep'-per-water, (a liquor prepared from powdered black pepper, used in microscopic observations.) &c.

PEPTIC=pêp'-tick, a. Promoting digestion; dietetic.

PE-PAS'-TIC, s. A medicine for promoting the digestion of food; a medicine for digesting wounds.

PER. By Latin preposition signifying by, for, on, through; as, "A man per se," i. e. A man who for excellence stands by himself, or alone: "A per se, A," i. e. A by itself, A. It is often used in such phrases as "A shilling per day," "A loaf per man;" in which it signifies for each. As a prefix, besides these meanings, it often amplifies the meaning of thorough into thoroughly or completely: in chemistry it has this meaning; thus a peroxide is a substance containing an unusual or thorough quantity of oxygen,—a maximum of oxygen,—as distinguished from protoxide, or a substance combined with oxygen in the first degree. The French form of this word is par; but words that come to us through the French often re-assume the Latin form; the Greek diá is often equivalent to per in Latin.

PERACUTE=pér'-d-cút', a. (See Per.) Very sharp, very violent.

PERADVENTURE=pér'-äd-vén''-tñre, 147: ad. (See Per.) By chance, perhaps: Some of our older writers use it as a substantive, signifying doubt, question.

Per-case, 152: ad. Perchance; perhaps. [Bacon.]

Per-chance, ad. Perhaps.

Per-haps, ad. Peradventure, it may be.

To PERAGRATE, &c.—See under Peregrine.

To PERAMBULATE=pér-ám'-bü-lát', v. a. (See Per.) To walk through or over, to survey by passing through.

Per-am'-bu-la'-tor, 38: s. One that perambulates a wheel for measuring roads.

Per-am'-bu-la'-tion, 89: s. Act of passing through or over; hence, a travelling survey; a district appointed for regular survey; annual survey of the bounds of a parish.

PERBISULPHATE, pér'-bí-sül''-fát', 163: s. (See Per.) A sulphate with two proportions of sulphuric acid, and combined with an oxide at the maximum of oxidation.

PER-CAR'-BU-RÉT'-TKD, a. Combined with a maximum of carbon.

PER-CHLOR'-IC, (-clör'-ick, 88) a. The epithet of chloric acid when chlorine is combined with a maximum of oxygen.

Per-chlo'-rate, 47: s. A compound of perchloric acid with a base.

PER-OX'-IDE, 188: s. A substance with a maximum of oxygen.

To Per-ox'-i-dize, v. a. To oxidize to the utmost degree.

PER-PHOS'-PHATE, (-fös'-fát', 163) s. A salt in which phosphoric acid is combined with an oxide at the maximum of oxidation.

PER-SUL'-PHATE, (-fát', 163) s. A combination of sulphuric acid with a peroxide.

PERCASE.—See with Peradventure.

PERCEANT=pér'-cē-ánt, 147: a. Piercing, penetrating. [Spenser.]

To PERCEIVE=pér'-cēv', 103: v. a. (See Per.)

To have impressions and consequent cognizance of external objects through the instrumentality of the appropriate bodily organs; it is possible to have the sensations without the cognizance, as in first infancy, before any knowledge has been gained: in this case it would be wrong to say the objects are perceived; also, to receive into the mind without the intervention of the senses, more properly to conceive in the case of sensible objects, but in the case of truths or facts offered to the understanding, the best usage sanctions the employment of to perceive; as, "I perceive your meaning." "He perceives his error." Bacon assigns it to things destitute both of sense and understanding; as, "The upper regions perceive the collection of the matter of tempests before the lower;" but this, if not meant figuratively, is improper.

Per-ceiv'-er, 36: s. One who perceives.

Per-ceiv'-a-ble, a. Perceptible.

Per-ceiv'-a-bly, ad. Perceptibly.

Per-ceiv'-ance, s. Perception. [Milton: prose.]

PER-CEP'-TI-BLE, a. That may be known by being seen, heard, felt, tasted, or smelt; that may be known only mentally; capable of perception.

Per-cep'-ti-bly, ad. So as to be perceptible.

Per-cep'-ti-bil''-i-ty, s. State of being perceptible.

Per-cep'-tion, 89: s. The power of perceiving by means of the senses, implying not merely an effect on the sensorium, but a certain state of the intellect as a consequence,—a consequence not original, nor necessary according to our first constitution, though necessary afterwards through the force of indissoluble associations established by repeated though unconscious deductions of reason: (a want of distinction between original capacity for sensation, and acquired power of perception, is one of the great defects of Locke's Essay.)—consciousness; observation; any single cognizance by the mind through the instrumentality of the senses; less properly, the revival in the mind of an absent object of sense, for this is properly called a conception; and sometimes a conclusion purely rational; but this is properly called a notion: see Notion.

Per-cep'-tive, 105: a. Having the power of perception.

Per-cep'-tiv''-i-ty, 84, 105: s. The power of perception.

PER-CIP'-I-ENT, 90: a. and s. Perceiving; having power of perception:—s. One that perceives, or has the power of perceiving.

PERCH=perch, 35: s. A fresh-water fish of prey.

PERCH=perch, 35: s. A pole, a rod; hence, a certain length as measured by a pole, and fixed at five yards and a half; something on which birds roost or sit.

To Perch, v. n. and a. To sit or roost, as a bird:—act. To place on a perch.

Perch'-er, s. He or that which perches: Bailey gives the plural Perchers as the name of Paris candles formerly used in England; and also of the larger sort of wax candles which were usually set on the altar.

PERCHANCE.—See with Peradventure.

PERCHLORATE, PERCHLORIC.—See with Perbisulphate.

PERCIPIENT.—See under To Perceive.

PERCLOSE, per-clōz', 151: s. (See Per.) The full or complete close. [Raleigh.]

To PERCOLATE=pér'-cò-lát', v. a. and n. (See Per.) To strain through; to filter:—new. To be in the act of filtration.

Per'-cò-la'-tion, 89: s. Act of straining through.

To PERCUSS=pér'-cūs', v. a. (See Per.) To strike so that the effect goes through or pervades the substance of the thing struck; to strike simply.

Per-cus'-sion, (-cūsh'-ūn, 147) s. Act of percussing; state of being percussed, a stroke.

PER-CU'-TI-ENT, (cū'-sh'ēnt, 147) a. Striking, having the power to strike.

PERDIFOL.—See in the ensuing class.

PERDITION, pér'-dīsh'-ūn, s. State of being lost, primarily by being given up completely, as by God, (see Per); hence, ruin; death; utter ruin; eternal death.

PER'-DUX, (pér'-dū, 189) a. adv. and s. Abandoned, desperate: [B. and Fl.];—adv. [South.] Lost to view, in concealment:—s. [Shaks.] One in concealment; one on the watch from a hiding-place.

Per'-du-lous, 120: a. Lost; thrown away. [Obs.]

PER'-DI-VOIR, s. That which periodically loses its leaves, as opposed to an evergreen. [Bramhall.]

PERDURABLE, pér'-dūr-rd-bl, 101: a. (See Per.) Very durable, lasting. [Drayton.]

Per'-du-ra-bly, ad. Lastingly. [Shaks.]

Per-fūm', 82: s. Sweet odour, fragrance; a substance that emits a sweet odour.

☞ The poets frequently accent both the verb and the noun on the former syllable, the noun so frequently that it is difficult to decide whether its predicament is the one here assigned, or Prin. 83, under which it is also placed: what is conceived to be the seat of accent in present colloquial use has here determined the preference.

Per-fū'-mer, 36: s. One who sells perfumes; less commonly, one who perfumes.

Per-fū'-mer-y, s. Perfumes collectively.

Per-fū'-ma-tor-y, a. That perfumes.

PERFUNCTORY, per'-fūngk-tō'-rē, 158, 129, 105: a. (See Per.) Done with the sole view of getting through, regardless how done; pertaining to a work done with the sole purpose of getting through it,—slight, careless, negligent.

☞ The original of this word is a Latin adverb, of which the verb, the participle, and the other related words, have just the contrary meaning, so that, if it had been derived from them, instead of the adverb, it would have signified completely done, thoroughly performed, in which case its accentuation would have been perfūctōry; but formed as it is by abbreviation from perfūctōri-e, its proper accentuation is deemed to be that assigned to it above.

Per'-fūnc-tō'-ri-ly, ad. Carelessly, negligently, so as to save appearances.

Per'-fūnc-tō'-ri-ness, s. Negligence, carelessness.

To PERFUZE, per-fūz', 137: v. a. (See Per.) To spread throughout, to tincture. [Harvey.]

To Per-îl, v. n. and a. To be in danger, [Milton:] —act. To put in peril.

Per-îl-ous, 120: a. (Not Perilous, though the usual practice of the language is to double l in situations where other consonants are not doubled: see Prin., 194.) Dangerous, hazardous, full of danger; it is ludicrously used in the manner of an adverb of emphasis, as perilous shrewd, [Hudibras:] and some etymologists imagine perilous to have been identical with this word. In Spenser it sometimes appears in the contracted form per'lous.

Per'-i-lous-ly, ad. Dangerously.

Per'-i-lous-ness, s. Dangerousness.

To PERISH=pér'-ish, v. n. and a. To die, to lose life in any manner, to come to nothing: (it seems to have for or with before a cause, and by before an instrument: Locke has by before a cause;) to be in a perpetual state of decay; to be lost eternally:—act. [Shaks.] To destroy, to decay.

The sign = is used after modes of spelling that have no irregularity of sound.

Consonants: mîsh-ün, i. e. mission, 165: vîzh-ün, i. e. vision, 165: thîn, 166: then, 166.

flammation and swelling of the throat or of the tonsils.

QUINTAIN, kwín-tain, 188, 99: s. An upright post on the top of which was a horizontal bar turning on a pivot; on one end of this a sand-bag was placed, on the other a broad board; and it was a trial of skill to strike or tilt at the broad end with a lance, and avoid being struck by the sand-bag, which was thus driven round to the assailant's back.

QUINTAL, kwín-täl, 188: s. A hundred pounds in weight.

QUINTIN. The same as Quintain, which see.

QUIP, kwíp, s. A sharp jest; a taunt.

To QUIT, kwít, 188: v. a. To leave; to leave at liberty; to leave in a state free from the obligation of doing or of suffering something; hence, to be even with; to discharge; it is also found in senses for which we now use To requite and To acquit. This verb is regular, though in some old authors Quit is found for Quitted both as the pres. and part. In many of the examples which Johnson quotes, Quit should be deemed not a participle, but an adjective.

Quit, a. Free, clear, discharged from, even.

Quits, interj. Used when claims are settled and parties are even with each other.

Quit-ter, s. One that quits; a deliverer; Ainsworth gives it as a name of scoria of tin: Quit-ter-rose is a term in ferry for a swelling on the coronet.

Quit-tal, s. Return, repayment. [Shaks.]

Quit-tance, s. Discharge from debt or other obligation; recompense, return: Shakspeare uses To Quittance.

QUIZ, kwíz, s. Something to puzzle; one whom an observer cannot make out, an odd fellow.

To Quiz, v. a. To puzzle; also, to examine narrowly with an air of mockery.

Quiz-zing, s. and a. The act of mocking by a narrow examination, or by pretended seriousness of discourse.—a. Fitted for quizzing; a quizzing-glass is an eye-glass.

All these words, which occur only in vulgar or colloquial use, and which Webster traces to learned roots, originated in a joke: Daly, the manager of a Dublin play-house, wagered that a word of no meaning should be the common talk and puzzle of the city in twenty-four hours; in the course of that time the letters Q, u, i, z were chalked or pasted on all the walls of Dublin with an effect that won the wager.

To QUOB, kwób, v. n. To throb. [Disused.]

QUOTIENT, kwō'-sh'ēt, 147: s. (Compare Quota.) The number resulting from the division of one number by another.

R.

R is popularly the seventeenth letter of the alphabet, though really the eighteenth: see J; it has a rough or genuine consonant sound at the beginning of words and syllables, being the 73rd element of the schemes prefixed; but following a vowel in the same syllable, and not coming before a vowel in the next word or syllable, it has not, in polished metropolitan utterance, a forcible consonant sound, but merely gives guttural vibration, length, and frequently broadness, to the previous vowel; see the scheme of vowels from element 33 to 54, inclusive. The letters rh are a digraph simply equivalent to r: see 164. As an abbreviation, R. stands for R. (King) for Royal, as R.N. (Royal Navy); R.A. (Royal Academician); R.M. (Royal Marines); which last also stand for Ready Money.

REAR-MOUSE=rĕr-mowce, s. Literally, a raw mouse, i. e. without fur, (see Rare;) the leather-winged bat.

REASON, rĕ-zn, 103, 151, 114: s. That capacity in man by which, when two things are mentally suggested, he understands them relatively, and in this manner has a notion or knowledge of them over and above the mere suggestions, and with this further power, that each notion so gained becomes a step to further knowledge; or to the same purpose, but with reference to the difference between man and the inferior animals, it may otherwise be defined the power of abstraction, or of perceiving what is common to two or more things, and so of acquiring motives of action distinct from appetite alone, or instinct, or habit: It is a passive, not an active power,—our will, while we are awake and while our faculties are healthy, lying over other parts of our nature, (see Thinking,) but never over our reason, which cannot, if it understand at all, but understand in one way: it is not acquirable, and it can no otherwise be assisted than by the suggestions sought for or presented: in some degree it is inherent in every man not being entirely an idiot; but in different men its force varies, and in the same individual it is not equal in force with respect to all suggestions, one man having a quick understanding of the relations of quantity, but not of quality, or of some kinds of quality, but not of others; and vice versa: in itself, as an ultimate principle of our nature, it is never erroneous; what we call wrong conclusions, being conclusions obtained by some artificial process taking the place of reason, (as an arithmetical calculation wrongly worked by a rule learned implicitly, or a conclusion obtained by the extremes and means of an Aristotelian syllogism when the rules of the art are unwarily violated,) or they are conclusions just in themselves, and wrong only as regards the assumptions or suggestions out of which they arise: it is a power which may however be lost, but the loss is idiocy, not madness; the madman continues to reason, but because of the distemper or disorganization, original or superinduced, of other parts of his nature, (a deprivation not always of the head only, not of the imagination alone, but often of the appetites and affections, or what we call the heart,) he is incapable of reasoning to a wholesome end: with regard to the idiot, his case is different; he does not reason at all, and we properly say he understands not, because he has no understanding, or because he has lost it:—ground or principle; cause efficient; cause final; argument; motive; ratiocination; just account: just view of things; conduct such as the state of things requires.

To REA'-son, v. n. and a. To apply the faculty of reason in order to understand something; to discourse with another in order to make him understand something by adducing premises, and connecting their consequences; to debate:—act. To examine rationally.

S.

S is popularly the eighteenth letter of the alphabet, though really the nineteenth : see J : its proper sound is the 59th element of the schemes prefixed ; but, except at the beginning of words, this hissing is more frequently converted into another element than actually sounded ; and the charge of a sibilant pronunciation more justly attaches to a defective utterance of the language than to the language itself when uttered according to metropolitan usage of the present day. Even at the beginning of words the s is not always sibilant, but with h forms a digraph which is the regular indication of the 61st element. In the middle and at the end of words it is very often vocalized, or converted into the 60th element : see Prin. 137, 143, 151, 158 : and in many situations the sibilant or the vocalized sound deviates into the 61st, 62d, 63d, or 64th element : see Prin. 147. As an abbreviation, S stands for Socius, (fellow :) Societas or Societatis, (Society :) Solidus or Solidi, (a shilling or shillings :) South, &c.
